the last four weeks at Multden. The endless procession of implements of destruction and of men to make use of them dwarf into utter insignificance any recession that I have ever seen, although at times I cannot help asking myself as I watch them rolling swiftly past how many of these brave young fellows will ever consist of spotlessly-clean, white carriages with a red cross painted outside and Red Cross nurses fitting about lustde like angels of mercy. The highest degree of human felicity consists of getting slightly wounded and all Japan's efforts, the attacks on Port being sent to the rear, to be regarded with moist eyes and waited on with sisterly solicitude by the handsome girls of the Russian Red Cross.

For several weeks after I came to Multe den the trains ran daily north and south with such regularity that one got to expeot their passage as a matter of course, just as one expects the rising and setting of the sun. One day this comfortable con-

At the southern extremity, of it lies the belenguered fortress of Port Arthur, which will never, if the Japanese have their way, hear the whistle of a Runsian rallway engine again. The captain of a battleship naturally lives aboard his vessel. The ceneor's office is a rallway carriage in a siding at Mukden, and when people meet one another in the streets they do not speak about the weather or say: "Bonjour! comnent aller-vous?" They sak, "Have you been to the station this morning?" or "Did as people living in a scaport speak of ships arriving.

The Japanese Advance. The Japanese seem to have learned very con of this condition of affairs, for soon after they had crossed the Yalu mounted bands of them-each band being saveral thousand strong-swept over the country to the east of the railroad.
