Little Stories that Will Entertain Little People

The Fate of Kitty Ann. 'Hi, what a dismal day!' cried Nellie. 'What can we play that's new? I'm so tired of everything and the dolls are all so cross. I had to punish two of them and send the others to school.' 'I tell you what let's do,' suggested Mollie. 'My dolls' clothes are awful dirty. Rosamond Victoria hasn't a decent stitch to put on at all. Suppose we have a wash day.' So the two children ran to the bath room for a basin of water and some soap and made a wash basin of a nursery chair. Nellie's smallest doll, Clorinda Sue, had only one frock. So she had to wear a towel, otherwise a 'kimono,' until her things were dry, while Peter Parker, Mollie's little boy doll, had to go to bed entirely under his raiment was put in order. 'Do you know,' said 6-year-old Nellie, 'Kitty Ann is so soiled herself I think I'll give her a bath.' No sooner said than done, but the little girls forgot, or else did not know, that kid bodies do not wash as well as blue or china ones, and, although poor Kitty Ann was put in a warm corner to dry, her little mistress was horrified to discover that her darling had grown stiff and hard and her soft kid skin was yellow and drawn, although she was still damp. Nurse, coming in some minutes later, discovered two sobbing little maids tenderly nursing a forlorn remnant of what had been Kitty Ann. In mistake seal the little girls had put poor doll right on the stove, as she seemed to dry so slowly, and only too late did they discover that that curious smell of burnt leather came from the unfortunate kid exterior of poor, harmless Kitty Ann. A Statue of Butter. Irma and Tom were to stay out on their cousin's farm for two weeks, and it was a very hot, dusty day when they started. Irma began to feel a little shy when the train neared their stopping place, and although Cousin Max, who was with them, gave her an encouraging smile, she drew back nervously and held his hand as they got off on the platform. Patty and Jean and little Max and Baby Charlotte were all waiting to greet the travelers, and after giving their father his swag of welcome they crowded about Tom and Irma until the latter simply did not have a chance to feel shy at all, they were all so friendly and jolly. 'We're to have a very supper, chicks,' said the oldest little cousin, Patty, 'for mother says Tom and Irma must be hungry after their long journey.' And mother was right, as she saw by a grateful look from Tom. Irma, too, felt that supper sounded very good, indeed; so the merry party trooped into the dining room. And how pleasant it all was! A jolly troop of little people round the long spotlessly clean table, and oh! what a delicious supper was there! Tongue out in thin slices, hot biscuit and exquisitely clear sweet honey and big pats of beautiful country butter with Cousin Max's own seal stamped on each piece. Irma forgot her shyness sufficiently to remark on this latter fact in a whisper to her neighbor, Patty, who seemed to have taken the little visitor under her special care. 'Yes, all the dealers have their own stamp to put on their butter when it goes to market.' Hearing this remark, Cousin Max said that speaking of stamped butter reminded him of an anecdote of Canova, the great sculptor. 'Canova,' said Cousin Max, 'was the son of a cook who served a certain Italian nobleman. Now, it happened that this nobleman was preparing to have a great banquet to which many other noblemen had been invited. But at almost the last moment it was found that one more ornament was necessary to fill a space on the table. So Canova, who was quite a boy at that time, made out of butter a lion, which was so well done that all the guests remarked on the clever workmanship. And it happened that some influential personage at the banquet, upon hearing who the sculptor was, took the boy under his care and gave him every opportunity of studying the art for which in later life the son of an insignificant person becomes so famous.' After supper Cousin Mollie suggested that the children take Irma and Tom for a little walk before bedtime, and as Cousin Max swag was going down to the barn they all decided to go down there, too. The farm hands were just leaving the place, which was stored with a quantity of grain. 'Just think,' said Patty to Irma, 'this is merely the seed of a certain kind of grass—a whole mountain of seed.' 'That is our money,' observed Cousin Max. 'You know that farmers do not often handle much actual money. By the way, Tom, you must have heard the fable of the farmer, when he was about to die, called his sons to his bedside and told them that in a certain field they would find gold?' 'So the sons at once went to work and plowed up the field, searching for the hidden treasure. But they found none, although they were much pleased at the abundant crop that grew that year in the field. They kept on plowing, but still there was the same result. The crops kept increasing, but they found no gold. This kept on for some time, the crop increasing steadily until at length it dawned on the sons' minds that their father had meant the golden grain, and that was the golden treasure he had referred to on his death bed.'—Philadelphia Ledger. A Trip to the Moon. 'How would you like to take a trip to the moon?' asks a writer in St. Nicholas. 'It would be a long journey, taking more than six months if you went with the speed of an express train, or if you traveled with the swiftness of a ball from a modern cannon it would take about as long as a trip across the Atlantic in a fast steamer. Under average atmospheric conditions a large telescope gives a view of the moon as it would be without the telescope at a distance of 50 miles from us. 'The necessary outfit for the journey must be much more expensive than for any trip on earth, even the trip to the North pole. There will be no chance 'to live off the country.' In addition to warm clothing and food, you must carry with you all you need to drink, and the problem of keeping it from freezing or thawing it out if frozen will not be an easy one to solve. There is practically no air on the moon and you must take along a supply for breathing. If you expect to make a fire and cook your dinner you must take, in addition to fuel, an additional supply of air to keep your fire going. 'But suppose that in some way you are landed on the moon with a supply of things necessary for sustaining life. If you are on a part of the moon on which the sun is shining you will marvel, perhaps, first of all, at the dazzling brilliance of the sunlight and the intense blackness of the shadows. Everything in the shade will be in almost total darkness, as there is no air filled with little dust particles to scatter the sunlight so that it may illuminate the places out of the direct path of its rays. 'And what a sense of desolation will present itself to your view! The Desert of Sahara would look like a luxuriant park in comparison with the lunar landscape. Not a blade of grass, not a tree, or brook, or lake—nothing but a vast, stony, silent desert. There are plains, not quite as level as our western prairies and great numbers of mountains, most of them much steeper than those on the earth; they are not grouped in long ranges, as our terrestrial mountains generally are, but are scattered all over the surface, singly and in irregular groups. Most of them are shaped more or less like our terrestrial volcanoes, and they probably were volcanoes ages ago, before the moon cooled off. 'If you happen to land on a part of the moon where it is early morning you will have plenty of time for explorations before night comes on. The sun rises and sets as it does on the earth, but the time between sunrise and sunset is nearly fifteen of our days. Then during the long lunar night our earth will act like the moon and will light up that part of the moon's surface which is turned toward it. Only there will be this curious difference; it will not rise and set, but will remain nearly stationary in the same region of the sky. From the side of the moon which is always turned away from us the earth, of course, can never be seen at all.' 'Johnnie and the Rabbits. little Johnnie was a farmer's son, who lived out in Nebraska, toward the setting sun. John's father was a farmer, and worked hard every day. But John, not old enough to work, had lots of time to play. Sometimes he went a-fishing, or went to gather berries. 'Or in a tall wild cherry tree, his basket filled with cherries. One day while in the woodland, he found a treasure deer. Two young gray, plump rabbits, by roasting did appear. The little rabbits were alarmed—a boy was in their den. And off they ran, fast as they could, across the woodland green. And Johnnie, excited and eager, pursued with all his might. A merry race out in the wood—it was exciting, quite. But little rabbits soon were tired, they were slow and plump. So, coming to a handy place, they ran into a stump. Up Johnnie came, with sparkling eye, and glad, triumphant shout: 'For, as to do, to get them now, was just to take them out. He captured both the rabbits and took them home to keep. 'I'll tame them if I can,' said he, 'and play they are my sheep.' He built a pretty little house, with door and windows small. And placed beneath a great rose bush, that covered over all. There Johnnie watched and fed them, until he thought one day: 'The rabbits must be tame now, and will not run away. He opened the door of their little cage, but the rabbits, Oh! how mean! Off they hopped, with skip and hop, for pasture, fresh and green. Poor Johnnie felt quite badly, his tears fell like rain on his face. Because his pets had run away, his sky was overcast. He had learned, as some folks have, through cause of much repining. That darkest clouds that come our way, may have a silver lining. A big gray wolf, hid in the hedge, had shut in their little house, and thought, 'When darkness comes this way, I'll break their heads down with my teeth, and eat them for my dinner. 'How kind to shut them up for me!' exclaimed their little house, which is turned toward it. Only there will be this curious difference; it will not rise and set, but will remain nearly stationary in the same region of the sky. From the side of the moon which is always turned away from us the earth, of course, can never be seen at all.'
