DOYLE IN HIS OWN BEHAL

Tells His Version of the Discovery of the Famous Portland Mine.

OCCUPIES WITNESS STAND ALL DAY

Direct Examination Completed and Cross-Examination Expected to Occupy Fully Another Day.

The threatened eruption of the day pre vious having passed off smoothly, proving to be nothing more serious than a tempest in a teapot, the trial of the Doyle-Burns suit proceeded along smooth lines yesterday without any untoward act to interrupt Mr. Doyle went on the witness stand when court opened, and was still there when court adjourned for the day. His direct examination was completed at 4 o'clock, when his cross-examination, which is expected to last over today, was begun by Mr. Thomas. The announcement that Mr. Doyle was to take the stand attracted a large audience of well dressed women, who were evidently curious to see the plaintiff in the now famous suit. The women occupied the rows of seats in the lobby directly opposite the witness stand, and listened with attention to Mr. Doyle's testimony until court adjourned.

Doyle's story of his connection with Burns was told substantially as follows: He was 36 years old, and born at Portland, Me., where he lived within a few blocks of Burns, and his relations with the Eurns family were very close, and so continued after both went to Colorado. Christmas day, 1891, Doyle was at Evangelical Lutheran school, dinher with the family, Burns having returned for the holidays from Cripple Creek where he and O'Driscoll had been under the grubstaking agreement with O'Haire and O'Haire, who was also present, remarked, "Jim, why don't you go up there and get some claims," or "Jim, why don" you locate something for Doyle up there.' Nothing further was said just at that time. but later in the day Burns persuaded Doyle to go back with him, when he returned visability and feasibility of re-establishing to the camp, saying he was lonesome and Young Men's Christian association in that he would "let him in on the claims." A few days later Doyle, Burns and in the reorganization of the association O'Driscoll started for the camp, Doyle taking along some $50 in cash and $20 worth of membership, but realize that without of blankets and other supplies. The first work they did was to build a cabin, Doyle doing his share. Doyle during this time was called to Colorado Springs as a witness, remained there a few days, and brought up some more supplies and witness fees of $5 or $10.

On January 22, 1892, came the discovery of the Portland mine. Doyle's interest in which was never disputed.

Story of the Disagreement, While they were at the Devil's Own some men came along and Burns offered to sell t to them for $100, at which O'Driscoll spoke up and said, "Be gob, you can sell your interest, but you can't sell mine. After some further words Burns turned to Doyle and said, "I will have nothing more to do with this man; gather up your tools, Jimmie, and come along with me; you and I will go in together." After the famous fight in the cabin which resulted 14 years old, which is under the age of in Burns and Doyle vacating in favor of consent, and thus adds greatly to the O'Haire and O'Driscoll, Burns and you and I will be partners equally from "Both of us, if you have any kick coming, we are partners," He told of the work done by them on th Tidal Wave under most discouraging obstacles, but how they kept at it, inspired by the hope of finding gold.

Doyle stated that he did as much work on any of the claims as Burns, and then That Burns posed somewhat as a prospector and left him to do the hardest work, and that in every undertaking he did at least as much as Burns. Burns was known in the mining camp as "Silvertip" and "Snowball." presumably on account of his gray hair, and Doyle was known as

Tells of Discovery. He told of the discovery of the vein of gold on the Portland and how shortly after the Portland Gold Mining company was organized. Owing to litigation Doyle's stock was placed in the name of Kate Burns, trustee. Burns handled the stock as though it was his own, Doyle having perfect confidence in him. When Doyle would talk about the stock he would tell him that as soon as the O'Haire case was settled he would account to him and give him his share. December 26, 1896, Doyle made a settle ment with O'Haire and secured a release from him. This he took to Burns, who promised to give him his stock in a few days. Shortly thereafter Doyle received premonition of evil and cautioned him to be from Peck, the secretary, a certificate cov- especially careful of the children. He ering his stock for his interest in the Portland only. He wrote back asking for all his stock. Burns sent him, through Peck, another small certificate for 29,000 shares, stating that was all he had. Subsequently Burns denied that Doyle had any interest in the other three claims or the stock for her husband; which they sold, and Doyle, after spending some time collecting testimony and gathering witnesses, commenced the suit here. Judge Thornell sustained the motion o the defense to suppress the deposition of

WHITCOMB ALSO HAD REVOLVER One Found in City Jail Where He

Had Thrown It. The police yesterday secured evidence in the shape of a revolver which they believe shows that J. H. Whitcomb, the prisoner who escaped from Sheriff Canning while being taken to the penitentiary at Fort Madison, to which he had been sentenced for six years for burglary, intended to shoot his way out of the city jail, where he was confined prior to being sent to the county jail. A prisoner who recently was released from the county jall informed City Detective Callaghan that Whitcomb had told his that while he was in the city jail a friend had passed a loaded revolver in to him, but that he had thrown it into one of the vaults in the cells. Search yesterday brought to light the revolver, which is nickel-plated with ivory handle. It was found exactly where Whitcomb described he had thrown

it. It had been unloaded. It is supposed that Whitcomb harbored the belief that when he would be transferred from the city to the county jail, after being bound over at his preliminary | Boosters.
