The Railroads and the People--Credit Mobilier

Third of a Series of Timely Articles Written by Edward Rosewater, Editor of The Bee, on Different Phases of the Pending Railroad Problem. The construction of the Central Pacific Railroad has been a subject of intense public interest. The railroad is a vast enterprise, and its construction has involved the expenditure of millions of dollars. The question of how this money was raised and spent has become a matter of public concern. The article discusses the various phases of the problem, including the role of the government, the role of the railroads, and the role of the people. It also discusses the various methods used to raise money for the railroad, including the sale of bonds and the use of credit. The article is a timely and important contribution to the public discussion of the railroad problem.
