Cultivators had been forced to have recourse to the money lender on ruinous terms, in order to meet the demand, whether paid direct to the government or through the landholder as middlemen. Since those days there has been much improvement in this respect, as was shown by the liberal suspensions and remissions granted in the famine of the concluding years of last century. The famine commission of 1801 recommended that the installment for recovery should be fixed in advance. The government has interpreted this in a reasonable way by deciding that each installment should be notified well in advance to the grospects of nesses wanted in the trial of George An-
