

SERMON ON FOLLY OF WORRY

Careful Observer Dilates on Evil of Viewing the Dark Side.

OLDEST INHABITANT IS WITH HIM

Both These Sapient Philosophers Agree It is Unwise to Kick Against the Pricks in Advance.

"The distant hills are always steep," quoted the Careful Observer yesterday afternoon as he watched the Oldest Inhabitant finish his glass of root beer.

"As I read the footprints in the sands of time," continued the Careful Observer, "we are apt to overestimate the tasks ahead of us and forget that the Lord tempers the wind to the lamb that has had its wool clipped."

"Of course, you are wise that it does not happen just as I have told it, but you catch my idea, don't you?"

He Gets the Point. All Right.

"I follow your line of thought," replied the Oldest Inhabitant. "The fact is, I frequently have noticed that some of us try to cross the bridge before we reach it."

"Then, on the other hand, suppose the contemplators have not repaired the bridge, of what use is it to worry over the bridge being out?"

"I have held that our troubles are not usually half as bad as we picture them," rejoined the Careful Observer.

"Well, I should say I do remember it. My uncle told me that many years ago a neighbor's house had been entered by burglars and I, in my childish way, asked my uncle what he would do if burglars should visit his place."

Then a horse ran away and the meeting broke up.
