HUNTING "FANTOM" MOOSE

Mysterious Animal that Holds Sway in a Montana Forest.

CRACK SHOTS FAIL TO MAKE A HIT

Hundreds of Men on Its Track at Different Times in Forty Years—Wierd Story of Frontier Experience.

Every man who has lived in southern Montana for any length of time, especially if he enjoys the hunting stories told by the old-timers, has heard of the "fantom moose" which makes his home at the head of Wise river and has defied the efforts of all the hunters of Montana to slay him.

For forty years or more this animal has held undisturbed sway in the forest surrounding the head of Wise river and not one of the hundreds of hunters who have sworn to slay him has ever had the satisfaction of seeing the animal turn a hair or falter in his step, no matter how many shots might be fired at him, how near the distance or deadly the aim. Many a real-dent of Butte has journeyed into the headwaters of the Wise river before the open season against moose was abolished in an effort to bring back the head of the old-timer, adorned with the greatest "shovels" ever worn by a monarch of the forest, back to town. All of these efforts have been failures, and still the old boy, who, because no one ever was able to place a fatal shot in his carcass, is known as the "fantom moose," roams the hills surrounding the head of Wise river, unafraid of man or any of the modern weapons he carries.

Just recently the hunting fever was developed in Butte by the unnatural cold weather which prevailed, and around a steam register in a popular resort a crowd had gathered, and among other things the story of the famous moose of the head of the Wise river came up for discussion, and it was up to a man who has been a resident of Montana for over forty years to tell the following story concerning the famous animal.

"I have been in Montana," he said, "ever since the discovery of gold in Grasshopper gulch in 1862 attracted the gold hunters to the southern part of the state. We called it Idaho at that time and the place we are now living in was known as a part of Oregon. As you all know, I have been inordinately fond of hunting; I would rather wallow through the snows of the mountains when the hunting season is open than sit even at the present time. In the early days I had the passion, and the years which have passed over my head, while they have not cooled my ardor, have sapped the strength from my limbs so that I can no longer follow a trail for a long distance as I did many years ago.

Big Game Plentiful.
"When Bannack was first founded; when the gravel bars and rimrock along Grasshopper creek were turning out thousands of dollars every day, I saw an opportunity of making my livelihood with my rifle and I forsook the diggings of the gold seekers and established a camp near the warm springs which are at the head of the Grasshopper. These days they call my camp the Elkhorn springs, so named because of the hundreds of elk horns which I left there and which came from the animals which I killed in order to help supply the miners of Bannack with fresh meat.

"It is needless to tell you of the hunts I had during those days. Elk and deer could be had for the shooting, and it was seldom necessary to travel far from camp to find all that could be loaded on a pack train, and, in spite of that fact that we had nothing but old muzzle-loading, single-shot rifles as our weapons, the game could be killed easily.

"Moose were comparatively plentiful, and it was no unusual thing to find a cow and a bull living happily together in the marshes which surrounded one of the tributaries of the Wisdom river, as it was then called, and which has since been changed to the Big Hole in honor of the big bear which surrounds its headwaters. Afterward, when it was learned that Lewis and Clark had named the branch 'Wise river,' the title was retained, and until today the stream is known by that name.

Track of the Moose.
"But I am getting away from my story. I had scarcely made more than one or two hunts in the mountains which divide the head of the Grasshopper from the Wise river, until I found the track of a big bull moose, which made a track in the soft ground as big as an ordinary work ox of those days. From its actions I knew it was the biggest moose that ever went un-killed, and my ambition was to slay that animal, let the cost be as much toll as it may. Day after day I tracked that animal through the forests and the marshes and willows which abound at the head of the river, but every time my efforts proved a failure and, though occasionally I could get a fleeting glimpse of the animal as he lunged through some thicket of brush, invariably he would get away, leaving nothing save a red hot trail to comfort me as a result of my long hunt.

"One day when I was the least expecting it, I found the big bull and his consort wallowing in a swamp less than a hundred yards away. Taking as good aim as possible with my old muzzle-loading rifle, which, by the way, was loaded with a bullet patched with buckskin, I pulled the hair trigger, and when the smoke rolled away there was an animal foundering in the marsh, and when I ran to it with a cry of exultation, I found it was the cow, who had been through an explosion—it had been burst from muzzle to breech. Every cartridge in the magazine had exploded at the time when I attempted to shoot the old moose, with disastrous results to myself. "I was bitterly disappointed. It is true, I had no meat, but I wanted that big bull with the shovel horns, which were fully a foot across. But I dressed the piece of meat which fate insisted should be mine, and in a day or two it was gracing the tables of the miners of Bannack. When I was in the town that trip one of the storekeepers showed me a Henry rifle. It was the first development of the modern magazine gun to be brought to the diggings, and as it looked to have great possibilities in the matter of quick firing, I bought it and paid five ounces of gold dust for it and 100 rounds of ammunition. Armed with this gun I felt morally certain that I could get the old moose which had evaded death by a scratch a few days before.

"Two days later I was at the swamp where I had hunted the cow, hiding in the willows less than 100 yards away, for the signs told me that the old bull had returned and was graving around the oval, which was all that remained of his companion of many a wandering through the timber and swamps of the Wise river.

The Wait and the Shot.
"For fully six hours I waited impatiently for the old bull to come to the tripping place, and when my patience was almost gone far in the distance came the plaintive cry of a moose calling for its mate. Nearer and nearer came the sound and with its approach I trained my rifle upon a clump of bushes through which I felt morally certain the bull would come as he approached the swamp. Presently I could hear the snapping of twigs and the goose-flesh fairly reared up and down my back an instant later as the biggest moose I had ever seen in my life pushed his way through the willows, calling piteously at the while, and stood for a moment, broadside on, less than 100 yards away. Only for a moment did he hesitate and then stepped forward to where the skull of his mate was lying and he licked it fondly with his tongue as if he could bring life back into the senseless brainpan. Then it was that I realized that I was there to shoot this monarch of the forest and I pulled the trigger.

"Instinct told me that something was wrong. All that I could see was a flash of fire and a roar of artillery. Consciousness faded away and I knew nothing for a space which seemed an eternity. Finally I became conscious of an intense pain and when I opened my eyes there was darkness on every hand and through the trees above me a glimmering of starlight told me that night had fallen upon the earth. My right arm was useless by my side and my head was ever seen in my eye pushed his way through the willows, calling piteously at the while, and stood for a moment, broadside on, less than 100 yards away. Only for a moment did he hesitate and then stepped forward to where the skull of his mate was lying and he licked it fondly with his tongue as if he could bring life back into the senseless brainpan. years ago I took my stand, this time being armed with a 30-30 smokeless, as deadly a weapon as is known today. I did not have long to wait.

"Darkness had scarcely fallen and the moon had just assumed her brilliancy, when far away I heard the plaintive cry of the moose calling for its mate. Nearer and nearer it came, until finally the noble animal stood not fifty yards away from me, broadside in the moonlight. Carefully I took aim and fired, but still the moose stood there, calling piteously.

"Time after time I fired, until all my cartridges were gone, but still the moose stood unharmed, and then, after he was satisfied that he could not find his mate in that swamp, he turned and re-entered the willows, calling, calling, calling for the answer which never came, and then I knew that the story told me by the hunters of the Wise river of a moose living there which was a fantom one, which could not be killed by man or beast, was a true one, and that the noble old animal, still true to his lost mate, wandered the hills and swamps and meadows of the Wise river, ever looking for the mate which gave her life to save his own over forty years ago."—Anacostia Standard.

The Meanest Woman.
Miss Carolina Powell of Boston said one day that she had heard that morning of the meanest woman in the world. "She called before breakfast at the home of a neighbor and said: 'I see that you have advertised in the papers for a cook.' " "Yes, I have," returned the other; "but surely you are not after the place?" "No," said the stranger, "but I only live two blocks away from you, and since I never met the person yet, especially the woman, who did not like the knocker."
