SOME PECULIAR THINGS

A Series of Strange Coincidences Related at the Bonad Table.

PARTED FRIENDS UNEXPECTEDLY UNITED

Travels of a Marked Ten-Dollar Bill—Lost Man Turns Up—Mechanical Nod of the Head Nets Big Money.

About five years ago a business man of New York whom it were well to designate as Smith received and accepted an offer to become manager for a large manufacturing concern in Philadelphia. He and his family had been living in their new home perhaps two months, when Mrs. Smith announced to her husband:

"You remember my speaking of the family of Jones who lived on the same floor of our flat house in New York? Well, I met Mrs. Jones downtown this morning and she told me that they had moved here also, and that her husband is manager for—," mentioning the name of the chief rival of Smith's firm.

"Well, that's peculiar," remarked Smith. "Yes," answered Mrs. Smith, "and they're living at 307 South Forty-ninth street and our number is 307 South Forty-seventh street."

On going to Philadelphia the Smiths had placed their daughters in boarding school. A few days after Mrs. Smith had met Mrs. Jones the Smith girls announced:

"Well, it's funny, but Ethel Jones, the girl who lived on the same floor with us in New York, started in at our school this morning."

The Smiths stayed in Philadelphia nearly two years, then moved back to New York.

where "Smith became manager of a business entirely different in character from that of which he was the responsible head in the Quaker city. The family home was established in an apartment house near by Columbia university, that the girls might be sent through the various schools and still be at home.

"They had been in the Horace Mann school but a few weeks when they came home one afternoon bubbling with excitement.

"What do you think?" they exclaimed. "Ethel Jones started in at Horace Mann this morning. Her father has come here to be manager of a business that is to start in opposition to father's. And guess where they live? On the other side of our street, just two doors below us!"

Both Smith and Jones are still at the head of the rival concerns, their homes have not been shifted, and one of the Smith girls and the Jones girl are now in the same class at college.

And a peculiar thing about all this coincidence is that though they have tried to meet each other numerous times, and made appointments to do so, something has always intervened to keep Smith and Jones from making each other's personal acquaintance. Yet they feel that they are not exactly unacquainted, and doubtless with good reason.

Followed to New York.

A few months after Smith had moved back to New York a man who had been under him in Philadelphia moved to the metropolis, where he took with Smith a position somewhat similar in character to the one he had held in Philadelphia. On the day that the van company started to transfer this man's household belongings to the freight depot, several squares away, the manager of the company, who was superintending the work, said casually:

"By the way, we're also shipping to New York today the household goods of a family on the street next to yours and the number of the house they're leaving is 432, while yours is 431."

Two days later the man was looking along 12th street, in New York, for the sign of a van company. Locating one, he went in and asked the man at the desk, who he thought to be the manager, if he could undertake the job that day.

"Sure," was the reply. "Where are the goods coming from?"

"Philadelphia."

"Where did you have them billed to?"

"The Harlem river station."

"That's peculiar. Not ten minutes ago another man who has moved from Philadelphia and had his goods sent to the Harlem river station dropped in and engaged me to haul for him. Where do you want your stuff taken?"

"Two hundred and five West One Hundred and Third."

"Pretty near the same," was the reply. "The other man has taken a flat at 105 West One Hundred and Third. How many vans will be necessary—how many moved you in Philadelphia?"

"Three," said the man.

"Say, this is getting to be sort of uncanny," exclaimed the van manager. "Do you know that's just the answer the other fellow made me? Have you a piano?"

"No."

"Neither had he. By the way, I see on your receipt here that the Blank company moved you in Philadelphia. Well, that company moved the other fellow, too. And good Lord, if you didn't come from houses with nearly the same numbers—yours was 432 and his was 431!"

"The man and his wife who went to 26 West One Hundred and Third street had no more than got settled when the wife said one evening at dinner:

"I made a surprising discovery while I was downtown shopping this morning. I almost ran into a school friend of mine from Pittsburg. Her husband has just moved here and they've taken an apartment in this street just two blocks away."

And she said to me, when we got to talking about the worries of moving and all that, 'Who moved you into your apartment?' I told her. And what do you think she said? 'Why, the same company moved us, too.' Since she has been in One Hundred and Third street this woman has discovered four friends of her schoolgirl days living in the same street, and all except one preceded her to the city by several years.

Chasing a Bill.

An iron manufacturer of Boston was entertaining a wealthy Spanish customer from Havana. They had several rounds of drinks, and, before the Boston man handed a $50 bill to the waiter, he jocosely kissed it goodby.

"Wait a minute," spoke up the Spaniard, "as he took the bill out of the waiter's hands. 'Since you seem to think so much of that bill, I'll write my name on it for good luck to you both."

Which he did, in ink, and then handed back the money to the waiter, who soon brought the change.

Two months later the Spaniard was in New Orleans. He walked into a cigar store to buy a pocketful of his favorite brand of cigars, handed the clerk a 20 bill and received among the change a $10 bill. He was carefully folding it when his eyes caught some writing across the center of the bill. His curiosity aroused, he took a close look—at writing was his own name! The God of chance had put into his hands the very $10 bill on which he had written his name in a Boston cafe eight weeks before.

The Spaniard is not only a man of wealth, but also of leisure, and he determined to discover, if possible, the wanderings of the bill from the time he inscribed it to the day he received it in New Orleans. He went to an infinite amount of trouble, set all sorts of machinery to work and spent not a little money, but after it was all over he felt that he had been amply rewarded. For, while he was unable to follow the bill step by step, he did learn beyond the peradventure of a doubt that a few days after the bill had been handed to the cafe waiter, it passed, unknown to him, into the hands of a cash drawer, who sent by his cashier to the bank, later turned up in Havana in possession of the Spaniard's cashier, and next made his appearance in the New Orleans cigar store. The Boston man's cashier had particularly noted the name on the bill, because of its being that of one of the firm's most valued customers, and he had meant to call the matter to the attention of his employer, but it had slipped his mind. The Spaniard's cashier had also noted the name, and naturally enough, and he had intended to speak to his employer about it on the latter's return from the states.

Crossed the Wires.

Several years ago a certain man suddenly disappeared, as men and women sometimes will. His family and closest friends made every effort to locate him, but with no success: it was as if the earth had swallowed him up to use an old expression. One friend, in particular, who had important dealings with the missing man, was extremely anxious to find him, but at last he, too, had to give up the task in despair.

About two weeks after he had quit searching, on the very date when the missing man's presence was most desired, owing to a business deal, the friend stepped into a boat to call up a business acquaintance in a town a hundred miles distant. He had just started to talk when the wire became crossed with another, and instead of hearing the voice of the man he had called up, he suddenly found himself listening to that of the missing friend.

"Hello!" he said impatiently. "I'm in Scranton. Is this?"

"This is your friend Brown," shouted the man, whose conversation had been interrupted, quickly conquering his astonishment. "And I want to know what on earth made you disappear a month ago and where you've been?"

"Of course, the man who had been missing up to that moment was also duly astonished at the coincidence brought about by accident. But, to make matters brief, he then and there went into consultation with his friend concerning the latter's important business deal, and the next day he returned to the bosom of his family and was forgiven for his protracted spreey.

Told the Same Story.

A firm of publishers ordered from a well known writer on things out-of-doors a true story that he had known for many years without using, of how a German, despondent because he had spent for drink the $25 that his employer had sent him out to change, wandered to a pier with the intention of committing suicide. As he sat around waiting for the crowd gathered about a yacht to disperse, so no one would be found to interfere with his plan, a man mounted a box to audition off the yacht. The German, as he thought of that stolen $25 and his disgrace, mechanically nodded his head from time to time, as some men in deep thought will do, and at last the auctioneer called out: "Sold to the gentleman seated over yonder."

At that moment in rushed a well dressed man and excitedly inquired whether or not the yacht had yet been sold. He was told that the German had purchased it. Rushing up to the latter, he said: "I'll give you $7,000 cash above the price you paid for it." The German, still thinking hard about the disgrace, nodded mechanically, and the next moment $1,000 in bills was stuffed into the hands.

Several months intervened between the purchase of the story and its publication.

SEVERAL DAYS AFTER IT WAS PUBLISHED

the writer happened to pick up another periodical, and in turning over its pages was startled to find that there was an article by an entire stranger relating the same facts that he had incorporated in his own article. Later, it developed that this second writer, like the first—had been in possession of the information for years, and also, only a few months before the publication of his article had it occurred to him to make use of the plot that had been ready at hand for so long—Washington Star.

CAPTIVATED BY A VOICE

The Environment as Ugly as Sin, but Vocal Charms Touched the Right Spot.

A former "hello" girl of the Washington Telephone exchange recently related one of her experiences on the wire, which she said had made a deep impression on her mind, and has since caused her to do considerable thinking. Here is the story as she told it.

"A man who worked in a downtown store was in the habit of calling up a woman friend of his several times a day. He had just the sweetest voice I had ever heard, and his conversation was simply angelic. His voice had a ring that was both captivating and musical, and I must confess I fell in love with that voice. His charming tone and suavity led me to believe that he must be the handsomest man in this part of the country, and I was almost dying to see him."

"One day I was excused from duty at the exchange and sauntered down to the store in which he was employed. I knew his name, having heard it called frequently over the line, and after entering his business place I asked a woman to point out Mr. Blank to me."

"There he is over yonder by that show-case," said the clerk.

"I looked in the direction indicated, and my dream of manly beauty was quickly and rudely shattered. Instead of the handsome fellow I had expected to find, Mr. Blank was as ugly a mortal as I had ever set eyes upon. He was baldheaded, one of his eyes looked to the east while the other gazed in a west-by-north direction. His nose was crooked, his mouth large and irregular, and he walked with a 'hobby-ketch-it' effect. In a word, he was as ugly as a mud fence that had been struck by lightning."

"Several months later I was introduced to Mr. Blank at a social function, and had a long conversation with him. I could have listened to him until daylight. He was so affable and interesting and smart—where he could talk on any topic under the sun and carry you right along with him. I have often heard of descriptive writers. He was a descriptive talker. He could take you from laughter to tears, from the sublime to the ridiculous. His charming personality was such that it served as a substitute mask for his physical ugliness and deformity, and through the maze of his conversation his ugliness disappeared and he really appeared beautiful to me."

"Where is he now? Why, he is home, I reckon. We were married, you know, but I did not have such an easy time getting him. There were lots of other girls after him."—Washington Star.

A Stubborn Opening.

The head of the household was going through her husband's pockets the next morning.

"What kept you out so late last night?" she suddenly demanded.

"It was the opening of the campaign, my dear," the lesser half replied.

"Well, it didn't take three corkscraws to open it, did it?"

And she drew the offending articles from his side pocket and waved them before him.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.
