throne, where the king, with his own hands, bestowed the crown.

Robe Worn by Her Majesty.

The coronation gown was a glittering, intricate importation of spangled, gold embroidered net, trimmed with cloth of gold and real lace. The skirt, which was cut long and full, was of white net embroidered in gold thread and raw silk, the pattern outlined with silver and iridescent spangles heavier at the foot and running vine-like to the hips. At intervals about the foot were inserted fan shaped pleatings of real lace. The bodice was cut low with a bolero of the spangled and gold embroidered net over a blouse of chiffon and a high girdle of cloth of gold. The sleeves were short and were formed of ruffles of the lace falling over a band of cloth of gold.

The coronation robe was of pale blue velvet embroidered in star shaped medallions of gold thread and following the broad band of ermine which edged it were gold ornaments studded with rubies and sapphires. The robe, which hung long over the full train was lined with pale blue satin and held to place at the shoulders with straps of gold.

The escorts to the queen were Margaret Wood, Faith Potter, Gertrude Moorehead, Bessie Brady, Ada Kirkendall, Ethel Tukey, Margaret Pritchett, Gwendolyn White, Laura Montgomery, Mildred Lomax, Phoebe Smith, Mildred Merriam, Hazel Cahn, Laura Congdon.

Tributes to Royal Pair.

The ladies of the court and ladies in waiting, who had thronged the dais prior to the appearance of the king and queen, were first to pay tribute to the royal pair. Then the escorting maids, who had waited on the floor with the governors, as their queen came to her own, ascended the crimson stairs and were thanked by her highness. Following them the governors paid respects and then the other nobles, subjects and vassals, who bow with concerted knee to King and Queen Ak-Sar-Ben, no matter of what race, religion, creed or politics they profess.

After this the dance and happy mingling of the beauty, brains, chivalry and wealth of the realm. The whole affair was one of ease and brightness, spirit and mirth. No delays, no vexatious mistakes, no wrong notes of any kind, but everything perfectly appointed and arranged and executed as it should be.

And today the king goes back to work.
