Typewriters Operated by Invisible Hands Between New York and Chicago.

MARVELOUS SPEED OF THE MACHINE

Thirty Thousand Words Reeled Off in Nine Hours—Fronsel Revolution in Telegraphy Practically Assured.

Two typewriting machines in New York today are operating, with incredible speed, by invisible hands.

In fact, the hand of the brain that is moving the mechanism of each of these typewriters, which at this hour are writing words and sentences, are a thousand miles away.

As one of the machines strikes A, at that instant it obeys an impulse in Chicago that it writes this letter of the alphabet in New York.

carry messages directly into typewriters, connected with an electric light current to operate their own mechanism. They are Buffalo and Chicago.

Feeding the Machine. Before each of these typewriters, resting on a table in the great operating room at the Western Union Telegraph building in Broadway, is seated a girl whose only duty is to feed the typewriter with the yellow paper telegraph blanks, to watch them as the wonderful automaton—this inspired typewriter—covers their surface with printed words, and to remove them when they are completed, ready for delivery to the person to whom they are addressed.

From hour to hour as the machine rattles along about its work she does not touch it. This wonderful machine is the invention of Dr. J. C. Barclay, assistant general manager of the Western Union Telegraph company. That it is destined to revolutionize the operation of the wire telegraph, no one can doubt—it has done it already.

And wonderful as is the adaptation of the typewriter in place of the little brass Morse sounder, still more wonderful is the speed of the machine.

The messages reach it from the city on Lake Michigan in practically an unbroken succession. The girl draws them from the machine at the rate of two addressed, signed and completed messages a minute.

Refinement of Magic. A few feet away at the same table a girl is watching a paper, half an inch in width, punctuated along its length with a triple line of round holes, glide swiftly between two small wheels on the side of a brass box, three inches wide, four inches high and eight inches long. From within the plain brass box comes a sound of the marvelous work it is doing.

The little box of metal and that swift moving tape, which never ceases to flow into the basket below the table, soon fascinates the beholder even more than the mysteriously inspired and operated typewriter.

Here is indeed the refinement of magic. This little box, that appears like a solid block of brass, is the hand and the brain that is operating the typewriter and brain, within another little brass box, that in Chicago is writing the messages on the typewriter here in New York.

The young girl keeps the machine constantly supplied with the three or five feet lengths of tape, so that they run continuously, hour after hour, an unbroken line of the punctured strips through the fingers of the weirdly precocious intelligence whose electrically charged brain is brass.

These punctured holes in the slender tape represent letters printed on the magic typewriter in Chicago.

The Human Element. Of course, human intelligence comes in somewhere along the line—it did not enter its relations with the typewriting telegraph system when Dr. Barclay completed his invention of the machine and his workman built it.

The tape is punctured by a machine assisted by human hands. It has a keyboard and works swiftly.

mits its words onto the tape into the calligraphic characters represented by the holes in the tape, this being the only writing the little brass intelligence on the tables can read and convey to his associate in Chicago.

This perforating machine in the hands of a swift operator can do all its work in placing a ten-word message on the tape in twenty seconds.

Simple as the typewriting-telegraphing machinery, it needs an electric expert to describe it—and then an electrically uneducated public might not understand.

First, there is the typewriter, of a standard commercial type, but with no keyboard. In the base of the machine are thirty pairs of electric magnets, each moving a type bar, for the machine prints only capital letters.

The typewriter-telegraph machine was first tried last December between Buffalo and New York. It was acknowledged an immediate success, crowning Dr. Barclay's five years' of hard work in perfecting its wonderful mechanism.

Capacity for Work. Four months ago two machines were placed in the company's main office in Chicago and connected by a duplex wire with two machines in the New York office. There have been in continuous operation since that time, each machine doing the work of three Morse instruments.

Over two wires operating three-fifths of the time with typewriter, telegraph and works swiftly.

for the wires work duplex—handles an average of 100 messages an hour.

The machine has also been tried successfully between here and San Francisco, with the usual results.

To a newspaper representative Dr. Barclay said: "My machine is suitable for the work of large cities and centers in these cities where the work is continuous and heavy."

"In addition to its ability to handle a large volume of business speedily and accurately and with economy, it has the advantage of fixing the responsibility for mistakes in the transmission of messages. Only the sender of the message can make a mistake. The message is reproduced in New York exactly as it is placed on the machine in Chicago."

At first the typewriter-telegraph system will be applied only to "trunk lines." Six or seven lines between here and Chicago will be equipped as speedily as possible, and the same number between New York and Boston. Other cities will follow—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

MUFF FOR HIS RICH HANDS

Jan Kubelik Plays Fair with the Insurance Companies and Looks Pleasant.

Only one pale, beautifully manured hand, swift in its movements as that of a prestidigitator, was visible at one time to the reporters who talked with the Bohemian violinist Jan Kubelik, as he came up the New York bay Monday aboard the resplendent Hamburg-American liner America, in from Hamburg, Dover and Cherbourg. The other hand was hidden in a black muff of Persian lamb's wool. Like the one arm of Joe Whitt, the mate of which was "look off" in America, "where the war was," the single hand of the violinist had the expressiveness of two ordinary ones. It acted as parenthesis, exclamation points and interrogation points to his slightly broken English, hardly a word of which he could speak when he was here four years ago. Sometimes it was the right and sometimes the left hand that ran into the muff, like a white rat into a hole.

"These hands are insured for $50,000 and that is why Kubelik is so careful about them. He said that the chill of a November day at sea—or even on land—might impair for a time their nervous nimbleness, and that is why he kept them covered alternately. He had used the muff all the way across, except at meals. His wife, the Countess Czeky-Czeli, was not with him, so he could not hold hands with her. He said that she and her year-old twins were

In fine shape and that she expected another, or maybe two other little visitors in January.

The unmuffed hand was a great help to the violinist in accentuating his meanings. It would have been a delight to a deaf mute, wont to reveal himself entirely through the sign language. The muffed hand was always quiescent, but the naked one—it seems a shame to describe so beautiful a creation as baldly—was so alert and at times so acrobatic that it looked as if it were endowed with a soul. It was no ordinary vaudeville hand. Its movements were always refined and graceful, and, although it was bare, nothing that it did, by the longest stretch of the imagination, could bring the blush of shame to the cheek of modesty. You could not imagine such a hand spanking the twins, even if they were so improper as to break the Stradivarius.

Mr. Kubelik talked pleasantly, with an accent that was quite charming, according to the woman reporter who got mixed in the masculine bunch, but the white hand was more eloquent.—New York Sun.

The Fleekle Pair. "My heart's broken."

"What's the matter?"

"I was making love to my sweetheart last night and her father came suddenly into the room."

"Well, that was awkward, but hardly heart-breaking."

"Wasn't it? The old man merely remarked that it was a pity she couldn't stick to the same fellow two evenings in succession. Then he left."—Cleveland Leader.
