MOUNTAIN STIRS FEELINGS Impressions with a Psychological Touch Wrought by Tower-

The story of the man who was so fright-ened at the notion of going up into the mountains that he tried to jump from the window of an overland train as it climbed the Colorado steeps to Raton, comes from Denver, to furnish material for some short story with the psychological touch. He was a man from San Francisco who had been in the east on a visit. He became ill, and his wife decided that he should be taken back to the Pacific coast. As the train passed through Kansas and climbed the long, gradual slope toward La Junta, the man became very much concerned over the probable effect of the high altitude upon DR. A. D. LAIRD, 215 Karbach Blk. 'Phone 3091. M-671 Jan 4 him. Twice in his life, he insisted, he had lest his reason temporarily by reason of the rarefied atmosphere of the mountains, The thought of the long, steep climb up the slopes of the Raton range in Colorado two of the pen to mention the fact that you saw the ad. in The Bee. terrified him, and he declared that he would sengers in the Pullman were called upon to watch him, and a number of times before the train reached Trinidad they had to hold agent of the railroad got on the car and rode with the Californian. Between Trinidad and Raton the road passes the highdescent into New Mexico. After leaving Trinidad, the man became very much excited, and as the train began the slow his seat several times and gazed wildly from side to side at the steep walls of the canon. His wife talked with him sooththey reached the funnel, when the dark-ness seemed to quiet him, and by the time they had reached Raton he was almost going blind and who wanted, above everything else in the world, to see the mountains again before her sight was gone forever. Both are suggestive of the very real influence of mountains in human lives.-New
