Total Eclipse of the Moon This Week

LONG time ago there lived in China two distinguished astronomers, Hi and Ho, whose official business it was to warn the nation in time against eclipses and other celestial performances. Now, it happened one time, as the ancient chronicles report, that Hi and Ho had been wanting in their office. They had turned their conduct upside down, sunk in wine and neglecting their duties. They had begun to go astray in their celestial calculations and to put their office far away. At the dark of the moon the heavenly bodies were not in accord in Fang (the head of the Scorpion). The emperor, who presided and the drum, the higher officers came in haste, the lower officers ran. Hi and Ho were corpses in their offices, not knowing nor hearing, and so they have incurred the penalty of the ancient kings. The book of punishments says: "Who comes before the time shall die, no pardon; who falls behind the time shall die, no pardon."

Recent Progress in Field of Electricity

The House Without a Chimney. Perhaps the electric city of the only twentieth century home in the state of New York, if not in the United States. The residence is the home of H. W. Hillman, a prominent official in the General Electric company's mammoth works in that city, and the modern house in Douglass road is entirely without a chimney. The only pipe of any kind through the roof or sides of the house is the ventilating pipe from the bath room, compelled by the city ordinance.

Entertaining Little Stories for Little People

The Little Storekeeper. "Now I'm the storekeeper, mother, and you must ask me when you want anything." Madge was perched up on the end of the couch, and beside her was the machine cover, turned upside down. "You see, this is my counter where I keep my things," and Madge arranged two tinblades, a pin cushion and a pair of scissors on one side, and on the other some pieces of gingham. "Mr. Storekeeper," said mother, who was making a blouse for Madge's brother, Dick, "do you keep pins in your store?" "Oh, yes; here is one," and Madge laid it carefully on the machine where her mother could reach it. "Now, I want some more thread," said mother. "There was none to be found in the store, but 'Mr. Storekeeper' said that he would send for it and it would come very soon. For a minute the store was left to take care of itself, and then the little girl came back wheeling her doll carriage, with Dick's cap on her curly head. "Now I'm the 'spesman,'" said she, "and I've brought the thread. "Here, ma'am," said she, taking off the cap and putting on her mother's big white apron again, "here is the thread you ordered; it just came in by the last train."
