BROUGHT A GHOST TO BAY

Thrilling Adventure of a Senator from Idaho in the Snake Valley.

One might never think of ghosts being associated with the hustling town of Lewiston, Ida. It is situated on the banks of the Snake river, whose placid green waters slide slowly along on their way to the yet greener Pacific ocean, a few hundred miles away. But Lewiston has a ghost story, and its principal actor is now a member of the dignified United States senate; a man who, in the early days of the west, had a varied experience with Indians, stage robbers and all such affairs, but none so hair-raising as the Lewiston ghost.

It was that the owners of cattle were advised as to their stock and its increase. The principal of this story was at that time in the cattle business with his father, and was the "captain" of the range. One morning he arose with the sun, to go to the designated place of meeting and receive reports. He threw a saddle on the back of his cayuse, strapped an army overcoat purchased at the post commissary store back of the horn of the maddie, so that, when the animal bucked, the rider was protected from serious injury. Then he jumped into the saddle, drew the reins taut, holding up the head of the cayuse, and started out. Not many miles from Lewiston there is a deep depression of the land. It is hidden from view by the steep hills. At the base of the depression there was a gibbet which was occasionally used to dispose of characters who would not be missed by the law-abiding community and whose presence had developed the majesty of the vigilante law. To one side little mounds of earth and stones marked the number of executions which had taken place. It was a dismal, lonely spot. Victims were made to it only when occasion demanded. For some reason the "captain" took this road to the place of rendezvous. The cayuse had done some little bucking, but unavailingly. The sun was glowing beautifully over the eastern range of the Rockies. The bunch grass, covered with cold gray frost, snapped under the pony's feet. He had not noticed that he was approaching the dismal valley until the cayuse wheeled and snorted in fear. The rider glanced around and distinguished the dark outline of the gibbet not far away. Then, to his amazement, he discovered what seemed to be the nude form of a man standing beneath the foot of death. He had heard Indians tell stories of ghosts walking there in the dead of night, and always laughed at their earnestness of detail. But this time he certainly saw an object there, and so did the animal. Sensations most peculiar traveled along his spinal column and irritated the roots of his hair. He was startled, but concluded to investigate. He urged the pony forward, and the ghost ran. Now, a real sensible ghost would have run up the grassy incline, but this naked ghost chose the rocky ridge. The future senator put spurs to his steed and finally caught up with the naked object. He jumped off, but the pony pulled back and away, and the ghost escaped. Another chase and then another. Finally a blanket thrown over the head of the pony made him behave, and the ever-present cowboy's lasso soon brought that ghost to bay. It was a man all right, but shivering, scarred, black and blue. Not a word would the object speak. It struggled to get away, but its captor hung on, and finally got the naked man enveloped in the old army overcoat. The next thing was, what to do with the prisoner? Duty demanded the presence of a place, and it was an ethic of the range that appointments must be kept. Duty also demanded that the ghost be taken to town. At least the captive was tied securely in the saddle, and the future senator trudged back to town, leading the astonished cayuse with his unsteady load. No sooner had the procession reached the outskirts of town than it became evident that something unusual had occurred. The sheriff came running to meet the cattleman. The people stunk away. Terror seemed to be in the air. The mild, gentle, unassuming gentleman who is now seen daily in the United States senate had captured a runaway smallpox patient, who died of exposure soon after his return to town. His former keeper also died. The cayuse took it and died. The "captain" lost his overcoat and all of his clothing. He missed his engagement with the cowboys, but lived to reach the United States senate.--Los Angeles Times.

Personally Concerned. Here the man with the fur trimmed overcoat spoke up. "What difference does it make to you," he asked, "whether we have good streets or not? You don't pay any taxes to keep them clean, so far as I know, and I've never seen you do any riding on them." "Maybe not," said the man who had been complaining, "but I have to walk across 'em once in a while and when I'm run-over by a delivery wagon or knocked down by an automobile it makes a thundering sight of difference to me whether the street is a mud puddle or not, you blamed duffer!"--Chicago Tribune. Venice as a Fishing Resort. Marion Crawford gave recently a dinner in Rome, and during the dinner the talk turned to Venice. "There is a young woman from Duluth," Mr. Crawford told, "whom I met one bright October morning in Sorrento. She told me that she was touring Italy with her father. She said her father had liked all the Italian cities, but especially he had liked Venice. "Ah, Venice, to be sure," said I. "I can readily understand that your father would prefer Venice, with its gondolas, and St. Mark's, and Michael Angelo." "Oh, no," said the young woman; "it wasn't that. But he could sit in the hotel, you know, and fish out of the window."--New York Tribune. See Want Ads Business Section.
