property, known as the Haney corner, a few months ago, for the purpose of building, and the general public has believed all the time that it was the intention of the Circle to erect a building this summer or next. The Woodmen of the World has persuaded the Circle to remain with it, and now the Haney corner is for sale. An option, which has all but expired, has been given on the lot at $[illegible], which is $3,000 above the figure the Circle paid. The option is in the hands of a real estate man, who is forming a syndicate to take the property. The deal is considered a sale already by the majority of the real estate men.

The Omaha Building and Loan association last week secured the deed to its new home—the Douglas block—at the southeast corner of Sixteenth and Dodge streets. It will not get into its new quarters until about June 1, as the tenants now there must be given time to find other places of business. Some improvements are to be made in the entrance, and new furniture and fixtures are to be put in the big room on the ground floor, which the association will use as its office. The building was bought from F. P. Kirkendall for $80,000, and a long-time lease on the ground was given by J. P. Black of Chicago, the owner.

President W. H. Green of the Real Estate exchange proposes an intellectual feast for the realty men at each one of their weekly meetings and will endeavor to have men of public note address the exchange. About two weeks ago John L. Webster talked on Omaha's growth. Next Wednesday Charles J. Greene will address the exchange on a subject to be selected by himself and which President Green has suggested will be on some question of national importance. Gurdon W. Wattles and William Gurley are

Thomas Brennan reports these sales during the past week: Two brick houses at 1134 and 1136 South Thirty-first, $6,000; three frame houses at 507-509-511 South Twenty-fifth avenue, $7,500; three frame houses at 1911-1913-1915 South Fifteenth street, $6,200; house at 911 South Twenty-fifth street, $2,600; two brick houses at 1142 and 1144 South Thirty-second street, $6,500.

others who have promised to address the realty men in the near future.

Nearly a third of a million dollars paid as wages to workmen who live in Omaha—that is what the new Brandeis building means. The new building, covering a full half block in the business section will be occupied within five months. It will be a monument to the enterprise of one of the leading business houses in the country and it will distribute hundreds of thousands of dollars among the families of Omaha workmen. The men who are erecting the immense home for the Brandeis firm are sharing in this firm's success in a most substantial manner. A prominent Omaha man who was standing near the excavation for the Brandeis store a few days ago remarked:

"Look at the army of men who are building that store. I'll venture that every one has spent hundreds of dollars of their earnings at that store and felt repaid. Now they are drawing hundreds of dollars back in the form of wages. When you spend money with an enterprising firm you are helping the town and everybody in it. Isn't that so?"

It is characteristic of the Brandeis firm that its money, which was made in Omaha should be spent in Omaha. It is estimating very conservatively to say that $300,000 will be spent by the firm of J. L. Brandeis & Sons in workingmen's wages before the new building is fully completed. This amount includes only the wages to workmen directly employed on the building. It does not include the thousands of dollars in wages received by the steel workers in the Paxton & Vierling plant, who are turning out the huge columns for the building, nor the wages of the hundreds of Omaha men who are employed in dozens of ways in the making of materials and furnishings for the great new structure.

Three hundred thousand silver dollars would make a neat little bundle. It would weigh close to ten tons. If piled up in one stack it would reach nearly half a mile into the air and would make any skyscraper look like a dugout. If the dollars were laid touching each other along the street the stream of silver would reach more than seven miles. More to the point that this, $300,000 would support 500 frugal families in Omaha for a year and a half without any additional means of support.

When Omaha houses which are the means of livelihood for hundreds of families the year round, spend as much as a third of a million in wages for the promotion of one of their enterprises, their value to the community can scarcely be too highly rated.

Interesting to Real Estate Buyers.

In today's paper there is a great deal of real estate advertised. Each property is a bargain, because anything bought now will be worth more in a very short time. Among the advertisements the Byron Reed company has an advertisement one column in length, which contains some special bargains in improved and vacant property, and those in the market will be well paid for reading and answering anything advertised by this firm. They have been in business in Omaha over fifty years and have a choice list of property owned by easterners and for sale at low prices now.

SIGHTSEEING IN A PACKERY

Facilities Afforded Visitors Both Picturesque and Educational.

COURTEOUS GUIDES SHOW WHAT'S WHAT

Scenes Less Revolting Than They Used to Be—Observations of an Eastern Pilgrim Seeking "Atmosphere."

A correspondent of the New York Evening Post, who has been in the west recently seeking material and "atmosphere" for writeups, found that the subject of the great packing industry had not been wholly exhausted and pounced upon it with the ardor of a professional. He visited several plants in Chicago, Kansas City and Omaha and was struck by the courtesies extended and the facilities for inspection afforded. He claims that a brand new system of "showing the plant" to visitors has been inaugurated and gives the following description of one as a type of all:

The comlisteness with which the sightseer is instructed, the picturesque methods of the guides, the studied efforts of the management to lessen rather than accentuate the disagreeable side of the pictures presented, and the care that is taken to render the "guest" immune from the unpleasant impressions that used to be a necessary result of a tour of inspection—all these aspects of the half-day journey through acres and acres of reeking buildings and pens serve to impress one no less than the wonderful mechanical inventions, the methodical order of the thousands of workmen, the phlegmatic butchers or the horror of the killing.

Through the care of the proprietors in providing the new system for visitors, the only distasteful features of the trip are those necessarily attendant upon seeing the slaughter and smelling the odors that cannot be chained. But a packing house must be a packing house, and one feels grateful that an essentially repulsive experience, undergone partly out of curiosity and partly because the stranger feels he ought to get a glimpse into one of the most striking American industries, is made as nearly enjoyable as courtesy and ingenuity can make it.

First, upon entering the street bordering the great brick buildings of the plant, the visitor inquires of a passerby as to the path into the superintendent's office. Of course, he thinks, a pass will be needed. Possibly diplomacy must be used to secure the permit to look into the place. Without trouble he locates the office. To his surprise he is greeted therein with cordiality approaching enthusiasm.

No Passes. No Red Tape.

"Would you like to go through?" says a clerk.

"If I could—"

"Oh, certainly, certainly! Just walk down that way"—pointing along a boarded alleyway outside—"and enter the last door on your left. You will find the guides there."

Following the directions, the sightseer finds himself in another office, a sort of bureau of information. Pass? No. Nobody seems to have heard of such a thing. A man in a blue uniform, with brass buttons, sits behind a desk; that is, he has been sitting, but he is on his feet the instant the stranger enters.

"Pray, have a seat," he urges, indicating a row of chairs. "I'll get a guide at once."

He withdraws a moment. On returning he says:

"Will you be good enough to wait just a few minutes? The guides are all busy this minute, but one will be along soon. Meanwhile—"

He presses a button and a flood of electric light is thrown into an adjoining room. "Meanwhile," he continues, "you might find it interesting to view our refined products. In that room are samples of the things we make."

The visitor goes into the sample chamber, which looks like a small grocery store, with its glass cases full of labeled bottles and jars and cans, and its tables piled with refined odds and ends out of and off of the beef or sheep or pig. In the bottles are extracts of beef, drugs made from internal organs of the slaughtered animals, compressed food pellets that are described as containing nourishment enough to keep a man alive for days, liquid soaps salable at fancy prices, perfumeries as delicate as those pressed from fresh flowers—the list of bottled products is interminable. The jars have their jellylike mixtures, for food or medicine. The cases are filled with chipped beef and the like. The odds and ends include knife handles made of bone, toothbrush handles of the same material, buttons of all sizes and designs, horns turned into noise-producing toys or real musical instruments, and many other small articles, of which one never has thought as products of a slaughter house.

The Old Joke of the Pig's Squeal.

"Yes," says the man in the uniform, repeating what he has said every day of his official life, "yes, we don't waste anything."

Then he perpetrates his standard joke.

"You know," he gurgles, "they say that when a pig goes through a packing house every bit of him is used except his squeal. And there's some talk of havin' that bottled and used instead o' hand organ music in the eastern cities."

It takes only a few minutes to complete the inspection of the sample room, and by the time it is over the guide has appeared. The guide, under the new system, is a small boy, 14 or 15 years old, or even younger. The management has found that it can teach them to be good teachers, and they are blessed with an ability to keep up their spirits and endure the monotony of the work better than grown men.

"This way," calls the boy, and the visitor starts out, having first confronted a sign reading: "No guide or employe is permitted to receive tips or fees."

The trip begins with a long walk between high walls, along cobble paved roadways. The boy is skirting the different buildings, leading the way to the one that is farthest away from the plant's entrance. It develops that the system provides for the visitor's starting on his tour at the remote end, so that he will be at the street door when the sights are all passed.

At last, the boy darts into a door, signals to a big freight elevator, and leads the guest thereby to an upper floor. From that point it is difficult to keep track of directions or distances, so various are the turns and curves; but one soon discovers that he is following a fixed path, wherein nobody ever meets him, since all who use it go the same way.

"Is this road specially for visitors?" he inquires.

"Yes," replies the guide. "A year or two ago, we had to take strangers right through the pens, but the boss has had this walk-way laid out so that they can see everything without getting close to the pens."

The walkway, in passing through the rooms where the animals are killed, is like a sort of elevated road, a viaduct above the blood-soaked floors. The visitor can see and smell, but he does not, as in most of the plants of Omaha and Chicago, find himself forced to ruin his clothing or to wade through blood. Besides, if he finds any sight too revolting, he can always get past that point. In fact, the path is so laid out that every part of it is convenient to a door leading to the outer air, since the walkway goes from building to building, on trestles, and a sickening odor or too disagreeable spectacle may be escaped by flight to the ouside.

"That's a good thing for the women," comments the small boy. "They might faint if they couldn't run out o' the door every little while."

"Do any of them faint?" asks the visitor.

"Never saw one do it yet," is the answer. "They start to, but they never quite get to it."

In turn the buildings used for killing sheep, cattle and pigs are visited. The boy describes the method of slaughter in each, pointing to the wriggling victim in its last agonies, then to the row of men who cut it to pieces and distribute the various parts to whatever branch of the plant they should go. No question "stumps" the guide, who, although he has learned many set speeches full of high sounding phrases, has been drilled so thoroughly that he knows slaughter house ways from A to Z.

"You don't enjoy looking at this a dozen times a day, do you?" the stranger asks him.

"Me? Enjoy it? No; I don't enjoy it, and I don't not enjoy it. I don't care a —, one way or the other. Ain't I paid to show people through?"

Shooting Cattle a Last Resort.

One of the sights, however, that seems really to arouse the boy's pride is the shooting of cattle. Now, shooting in a slaughter house is not common, and that, possibly, is the reason he takes an interest in it—he himself does not witness it often enough to view it with the placidity that distinguished him as he sees an ox mauled with a club or a pig stuck to death with a sharp knife. Shooting is a last resort, a means of killing used only when the club has failed to do its work, and often it is attended by extraordinary excitement.

On the day in question, for example, the visitor is fortunate enough to see the unusual method employed. The wielder of the club, who strikes down the huddled cattle as they are driven past him, discovers that one beast has risen from the heap of unconscious animals. Unless something is done, and done quickly, the revived victim may rush across the floor, madly butting his way through the group of blood-bespattered fellows awaiting the arrival of his dead body. He must be killed before he can start.

The man with the club, who has been on the lookout for such an emergency, suddenly unstraps a rifle hanging on his shoulder. As the fast reviving beast rises, the man aims. There is a sharp report. Quivering, the animal falls to the floor, amidst his fellows. A minute later, like the rest, he is being hoisted by the hoofs on a giant pulley, and whirled across the long room towards the men with the knives, who make short work of him.

This is one of the scenes of the slaughter house. The others, though less unusual, are equally pitiful. The visitor is not sorry when he leaves them behind and is led across a trestle to the building wherein finished products are manufactured.

One of the rooms he enters is full of tables, on which masses of butterine, made of fat, are being patted into cakes for sale throughout the world. Another has tin-cutting and soldering machines roaring from one end to the other, turning out cans and boxes of every shape and size, and another is a factory for barrels and boxes and bags. The slaughter house proprietor is a manufacturer of everything he uses, from the rope that supports the dead beef to the ice in which the dressed carcass is packed and the box in which the allied product is shipped.

There is a special department for making chipped beef. At a long table sit two opposite rows of girls, who, as the chips from a cutting machine are sent along in front of them on a moving trough, rapidly grasp handfuls and pack the chips into round tin cans.

Then there is the long room in which hams are smoked. On the two sides are big chambers, like ovens, high enough for a man to stand in, filled with smoke so thick that when a little of it escapes it half blinds the stranger unaccustomed to having his eyes subjected to such a strain. Here the guide makes a speech on the purity of the processes employed, offering to prove to the sightseer that everything is as it should be.

Finally, after half a dozen other branches have been inspected, the boy leads the way to the last stop, as he calls it. There he stands before a glass wall through which he points to the cold storage room. Rows and rows of dressed beeves hang on hooks—in a temperature far down, the boy tells you—ready for shipment or for sale to any one who comes to buy.

"That's all," the guide announces, with a tone of relief, for the day is nearly gone, and he has been showing the sights since early morning. Then, because he has been a good guide, the visitor slips into his hand a quarter, disregarding the anti-tipping rule of the plant.

Looking Ahead.

Gutenberg was inventing the art of printing.

"It's absolutely necessary," he said. "Books will be needed to fill the Carnegie libraries, and the old processes are too all-fired slow."

Banishing with an effort of the will a misgiving as to what the future would bring forth in the way of best sellers, dime novels, book agents and patent medicine advertisements, he distributed a handful of pi and set up another sale bill.—Chicago Tribune.

OUT OF THE ORDINARY.

Spain receives more sunshine than any other European country. The yearly average is 3,000 hours, while in England it is 1,400.

Medical men on an average die sooner than other professional men, says an authority. Between the ages of 45 and 65 two doctors die to one clergyman.

Elephants often take the place of nurses in Asia. The children are lifted on the elephant's back with his trunk; he then goes a short distance from the village, places them on the ground and guards them.

An ostrich feather, if held upright, will be seen to be perfectly equal on both sides, the stem dividing it exactly in the center. In other feathers the stems are found to be more or less on one side.

In an Irish town not long ago a crowd watched nearly 150 rats cross above the ground on a telephone wire from the town hall to a flour mill over 200 yards away. The rats used their tails to preserve their balance and not one made a false step.

A twenty-year-old number of Spurgeon's magazine, Sword and Trowel, says: "In Cromwell's day the royalists first called the liberals whigs, taking the first letter of each word in their motto, 'We Hope in God,' and forming them into this word."

Brazilian ants make little gardens in the tree tops and sow them with pineapple and other seeds. The gardens are found of all sizes, from a single sprouting seed surrounded by a little earth to a densely overgrown ball as large as a man's head.

While there are in France 1,500,000 farmers who depend principally on their vineyards for their livelihood, there are 500,000 agents who live by selling their wines. It is now proposed to cut off these agents and turn their profits into the pockets of the producers.

One of the principal reasons for the final abandonment of the drum in the French army is the new short-term service. It takes a year and a half to make a drummer, so that no sooner would the French drummer have become proficient than he would begin to get ready to return to civil life.

Cody Bryant is the wealthiest negro in Georgia. He owns nearly 3,000 acres of the finest farming land in the central part of the state and is reputed to be worth about $100,000. Bryant has the respect and confidence of many influential whites and his credit with banks and mercantile houses is practically unlimited. He pays no attention to politics and has outspoken contempt for the professional negro office seeker.
