Another Important point gained by the grain dealers, if the referee's, report is adopted, is that the material part of the Gondring act will be declared repealed and the defendants will not be subject to criminal prosecution for their actions prior to the Junkin act, which went into effect in July, 1966. In declaring that the state elected to stand on the Junkin act and that the Gondring act was repealed by the latter. the court will relieve the grain dealers of considerable anxiety. While the Junkin act is considered a stringent statute, the proof submitted by the attorney general related almost entirely to actions of the association prior to the adoption of the Junkin law. If the report of the referee is adopted the association stands perpetually restrained straint of competition. This end is all that the supporters of the suit say they desired to gain. Having gained that point and lost others, they are satisfied. It matters not, they assert, whether the corporations lose their franchise or not, if they are perpetually restrained from operating as a conspiracy in restraint to trade the object of the litigation has been accomplished. The holding of the referee that the grain association has been operating as a conspiracy is satisfactory to the supporters
