The Almonigement

OLLOWING the vogue of small sleeves, which have come in through Empire influences, blouse sleeves are diminishing daily in size and increasing proportionally in economy—it is always easy to remodel when fashion allows things to become smaller.

The new styles are fatal to thin arms, for the pretty puffed top has its transparency accentuated by designs executed in filmy lace, and, at present, everything is elbow length, although we are promised long sleeves again at no very far distant date. However, it is better to display a little independence rather than an ugly forearm, and to wear a long cuff at-tached to a puffed top that is somewhat larger than the extreme of fashion demands. A combination of long cuff with the narrow puff (which is perfectly good for an elbow sleeve) makes up a badly proportioned sleeve.

To all unlined sleeves the little staying tape is not only a boon, but a To all unlined sleeves the little staying tape is not only a boon, but a necessity. It is usually arranged as shown in the sleeve which ends in a long cuff made up of rows of blas bands and fagoting. This design is a very practical one, as the cuff may be lengthened or shortened without spoiling it, while its graceful simplicity makes it appropriate for any of the simple sorts of blouses.

For an elaborate blouses, nothing could be prettler than a sleeve like the one pictured, in which insertion is made to wind about isolated motifs of hand embroidery. The fluffy elbow trimming is formed entirely of insertion, instead of the usual lace edge. By adjusting tapes as indicated—letting them come from the top of the arm all the way to the end of the narrow puff, the sleeve may be worn above or below the elbow as fancy dictates.

A good arrangement of Irish crochet, or of any other heavy lace, is also shown. Here a broad insertion holds the puffs on top, while a staying tape is invisibly tacked to the inside. This sleeve was designed for a blouse made entirely of alternating strips of lace and puffs of soft liberty satin.

The Arrange -

Tapes on the Top of the Arm

on the Wrong Side

For Baby's Coach in Summer

Baby in his coach always looks charming, but never more so than in summer under his dainty coverings of pique or much-befrilled lawn, his syes shaded by soft lace-hung parasols.

Needless to say, these white coverings must be always kept immacuiate, and, therefore, in the selection of them it is well to choose those that will launder easily.

There is nothing more really satisfactory than pique for summer coach covers. These may be absolutely plain, covers. These may be absolutely plain, simply finished with an embroidered scallop, or they may have a rather elaborate pattern in eyelet embroidery and satin stitch. As a rule, a separate piece is added to the top, put on in a French seam, to look as if it had merely been turned down.

Frequently master baby sports his monogram or initials, embroidered in three or four inch letters in the centre of this turned-over flap.

Frequently master baby sports his monogram or initials, embreidered in three or four inch letters in the centre of this turned-over flap.

Some of the newer and more elaborate pique covers have the turned-back section shaped and edged with a ruffle of the embroidery, while, in the body of the cover insertion, is set in a simple design, reaching half way to the bottom hem.

Very dainty and fluffy are coverings of white Persian lawn, with lace-edsed ruffles and tiny tucks and insertion. The insertion also outlines the under part of the cover. This is fastened to a lining of pink or blue silk or satin, while the pillow is trimmed to match. Sometimes the ruffle is put on with a beading, through which narrow ribbon, a slightly deeper shade than the lining, is run.

For days when there is a touch of chill in the air a little white cashmere blanket, bound in soft wash ribbon, is found very convenient either to use sions or to slip under a lingerie cover.

Though English coaches, with leather tops, and easily run push carts have rather forced in the background the fluffy parasol, baby is never more fascinating than when peeping from beneath one. The tops of these parasols must by all means be quickly removable, since soot and flith improveth not their looks. No more satisfactory style can be found than a top of dotted point d'esprit, finished with a deep hem with three or four inch tucks above it. This is adjusted by a draw string, concealed under a ribbon bow, to the white or colored silk parasol beneath.

Dainty straps come for the summer coach—some in colored satin, hand painted; others in white leather, with a pattern embossed in gilt; still others, more serviceable than these, of heavy canvas piped in colored leather and embroidered in a sample cross-stitch pattern.

As baby is sure to be thirsty on his summer walks, one of the new little

As baby is sure to be thirsty on his summer walks, one of the new little drinking cups, which come in tiny pink or blue boxes of hand-painted celluioid, proves a useful as well as a dainty adjunct to his coach.

An Inartistic Room Transformed

N artistic studio was made the other day of a most inartistic room, which had doors and weed-work painted a dull, uninterestwork painted a dull, uninteresting brown.

The paint was scraped and sand-papered off, and the woodwork stained with green, and afterwards varnished. Burlap of a soft green formed the lower covering of the walls, with a paler, though no less soft green felt above it.

A high settee stood at one end of the room, stained the same green, and piled high with cushions of every color under the aun. On its high top, which turned over like a little shelf, was set a bit of French pottery, the soft dull brown glazed kind, and, flanking it, a vase of atrong mahogany color, which struck a vivid yet restful note of color in the room.

The pictures (they were vary contractions)

The pictures (they were very few) were framed in narrow, plain black frames, with plenty of mat to set them off, and furnish a little relief from the off, and furnish a little relief from the ubiquitous green.

Near the window, yet far enough away to be in no danger from draughts (for a plane takes cold easily), was the plane, in a black case.

Hangings, as they are usually known, did not exist, for the studio was consecrated to music and its owner insisted that hangings interfere with "tone." Only the two windows were curtained, and they with a coarse fishnet of an ecru that that seemed the one necessary light touch in the room.

Even those curtains, she says, she is going to get rid of when she can have the window panes turned into the fascinating leaded kind which are eloquent of art and music and quaint old-time architecturs.

me architecture.

A Country House

While the bedrooms in a country or suburban home must be sil cool, airy grace and unpretentiousness, costly though it may be, for the first floor a totally different treatment is demanded; colorings are strangers, effects more daring, simplicity less insisted upon, while the woodwork plays a more important part. Even here, though, is lacking the rich elaborateness and very evident elegance that is permissible in a farm house, for the aim of the average owner of a country place is to have it unobtrusively charming—in keeping with the simpler life of summer.

The papering of downstairs rooms depends largely upon the style of the architecture. Small cottages, with but a single living room, as a rule have it hung with gay chints or flowered patterns to give a cheerful, homelike touch, while houses with a hail and suite of living room, library and dining room permit a pleasing variety.

Frequently a whole lower floor is papered in one color with different tones and designs for each room. In one such scheme green was used—a cool green and white stripe for the hail, a rich forest tapestry for the library, its massed foliage lightened by yellow-green flowers; a two-toned veluteen, covered with a conventional graps design, in which the dull purples and reds of the fruit did not detract from a general impression of greenness, above the high oak wainscoting of the dining room, while the drawing room, which was rather small, the library being used for the general family life, was charmingly plain, being in a creamy satin damask effect, with vines of delicate green falling over the upper half of the wall, as if suspended from the picture moulding.

Another house, equally attractive, was papered throughout in yellows, from deep yellow brown to palest canary.

If at all possible, some of the downstairs rooms should be wainscoted. If but one or two can be treated in this way, it is well to confine it to the library and dining room, though a living room is particularly effective finished in white enameled panel

Reaching Just Below

The papers for such a treatment are charming in the French eighteenth century styles, the "English Morris" patterns or some of the artistic French or German tapestries.

or German tapestries.

However much one may admire this wainscot finish—and it is good in all the natural hardwoods and in the new soft stains that are such perfect imitations—it is scarcely advisable in building a house to use it too extensively. One woman who went into raptures over a friend's wainscoted bedroom straightway had the entire upper floor of her new home done in the stanty wood, reaching within a few bedroom straightway had the entire upper floor of her new home done in chestnut wood, reaching within a few feet of the raftered ceiling, and felt ever after as if she were living in a series of cigar boxes. Variety cannot be too strongly recommended, and the long, straight lines of plainily papered walls, especially in the low-ceilinged modern house, are both restful and form excellent backgrounds for pictures and hangings.

The gay paroquets and cockatoos so much in favor this season are extremely stylish for large living rooms in the country, though they are scarcely advisable when repapering cannot be done often, as one is apt to tire of so striking a style. For the present, though, these vivid tropical birds, bright howers and brilliant foliage are all the rage, and will probably clearly mark most of this season's new houses.

Hall papers, as a rule, lack suggestion, and the walls are kept cool and neutral in character.

Whatever paper is used on the lower foor rooms—and with the two-tone tion, and the walls are kept cool and neutral in character.

Whatever paper is used on the lower floor rooms—and with the two-tone and two-colored veluteens, Art Nouveau designs, gobelin and modern tapestries, English high-colored arts and crafts papers, exquisite satin damasks, slik fibres, Japanese grass cloths and old Cordova leather effects, papers in stripes, figures or flowers, and papers old English, French decorative, ancient German, there should be no difficulty in gratifying every taste—the method of putting it on the walls is the same: no borders, no fringe nor dado, simply a plain stretch from baseboard right up to plaster cornice or molding, with a white ceiling to top it.

Cleaning and Renovating Wicker Furniture

ICKER furniture, especially that left out of doors, gets in a little while very soiled from the dust and soot in the atmosphere. Indeed, without extreme care the closely woven or rolled tops become unpleasantly filled with various small insects.

There is a more or less prevalent impression that wicker is hurt by water. This is quite erroneous. In fact, a good scrubbing occasionally not merely improves its appearance, but tends to prolong its life.

proves its appearance, but tends to prolong its life.

The proper way to care for wicker furniture is to dust it well, getting into all the crevices, then wash it off with clear water in which a little ammonia has been placed. Do not treat the article to be cleaned to a regular soaking and then let it dry at its own sweet will. Instead, scrub carefully with a wet cloth and dry thoroughly—especially in those parts of the furniture where water might be held.

When wicker grows too yellow, as it frequently does with age, it takes paint very well. Natural colored porch chairs and couches which have become weather-beaten may be absolutely rejuvenated by giving them several coats of dark green paint with a final coat of enamel to prevent rubbing off on light gowns.

Any woman who does not object to a little daubiness can easily do the work herself. Buy tubes of ready-prepared paint, or what is cheaper if there is much furniture to renovate, get it mixed by a painter.

It is well to caution the novice in such work to apply her paint thinly and evenity by allowing each coat to entirely dry before the next is put on. Too great lavishness in the use of the paint makes rough, lumpy work, which, moreover, is liable to blister.

Midsummer Mourning

DEAD WHITE, without the least scrap of black about it, is fast taking precedence over anything and everything else in the shape of mourning for midsummer weather.

But the plainness of white must be emphasized—it s not the airy, beautiful, fluff characteristic of the summer girl armed for her campaign. Trimming must be kept subdued, and lewelry, except for the useful bits (and even this as plain as the proverbial pipestem), is tabcoed.

ing the edge off the white and soft-ening the contrast charmingly.

There are short boleros and long ones, believos which are so they that the fronts are a long way from meet-ing; others which lap, or that just meet, or are joined by the narrowest of walstecats—bended or embroidered or braided into the prettiest sorts of things.

or braided into the prettiest sorts of things.

In the realm of washable believes wonderful things have been evolved—the little lackets which are only one remove from capes being the simplest of all. Others are made of such sheer fine stuffs that they look as though they were another evolution of handkerchiefs (like the corset covers and stocks of a couple of years ago), and stocks of a couple of years ago), and some of the lovellest—the ones that come as a part of beautiful robes—have bands of another color of linen applied to the edge of both bolero and skirit with a parasol to match, all three pieces embroidered and embroidered in beautiful, involved designs. Violet or blue—the soft French blue which is reminiscent of yet so much prettier than old-time China blue—or any of the many new shades of pink and rose-color, combine in this fashion exquisitely with white, especially when the color-part is made of one of those new French linens which take the color in the soft, pretty way characteristic of pastel colors.

Lace boleros are lovelier than they

Lace boleres are lovelier than they Lace boleres are loveller than they were even so short a time ago as the spring, for ideas which were simply the germs of ideas then have blossomed forth in rare new ways. Lace inlaid and encrusted with more lace, batiste and lace tangled up into a harmonious, beautiful something that is neither—there are more changes rung upon the theme of lace boleros than would be thought possible.

And the pleated skirts, which sprang into favor so suddenly, have brought

A Black Silk Bolero for a Black and White Costume French-Irish "Crochet" - Made With a Braid

THAT fascinating short jocket which takes its name from one of the national dances of Spain, the bolero, has been developed this season into dozens of interesting forms.

esting forms.

The great success of princess and Empire styles paved the way for it, and then it went ahead on its own account, tried this material and that, suddenly conceived the idea of being a separate jacket, and succeeded in each in a way that was as unexpected as it was attractive.

Separate holeros, by the way, of black taffeta make stunning accompaniments to black and white checked or striped skirts, with a white blouse accentuating the white part of the costume as the bolero does the black. They serve a dozen purposes—act not only as a part of an effective costume, but in the useful guise of the separate little wrap so comfortable on the occasional chili days.

But—keep a black slik bolero strictly to black. It may be as elaborately trimmed as you please, braids and bands and pipings and cordings and buttons all taking a part in it, with black valenciennes lace (which is one of Paris latest fads) frilled on by way of adding a touch that is light.

Perhaps, if it is made after one of the collarless models, a white linen collar is worn with it, but great care must be exercised in choosing that collar, so that the combination may not be startling. Collars of handkerchief linen, lavishly embroidered, and perhaps inset with lace, are so sheer that the black shows through—"takwith them the prettiest pleated bolers—the hardest thing to make, but an odd, interesting little style when just the right woman wears it. But the wrong one in it—!

More boleros even than any other sort of coat are made with elbow sleeves, some of the most attractive made with sleeves that are almost applicates for sleeves—loose and flowing and apparently with more of the lines of little capes than of sleeves. Upon the embroidered boleros the sleeves are embroidered as well as the front and back, with perhaps the ever-useful scallop dragged in by way of a finish.

Those little postilion backs are high in favor in bolero fashions—some of the linen ones having the taba which fall below the waist made of lace.

Centerpieces in Color

VEN centrepieces show the color influence, and we have gone back to the solid embroidery on white linen, where the whole effect depends on the worker's artistic sense and knowledge of shading. These new floral designs are bolder than formerly, and we see hydrangeas, poppies, hibiscus, azaleas, or roses instead of dainty Dresden flowers.

By fall there promises to be many new ideas in colored embroidery developed in wool and floselles. The work is German in character, the designs modified Art Nouveau and the coloring extremely rich in mahogany, old blue, green, red and yellow tones, brought out by a black outline.

The stitches of this coming work, though intricate in appearance, are really adaptations of well-known forms—as, for instance, a couched pineapple stitch or a much-slanted satin stitch, barred in a different color, or the satin stitch done in three or or the satin stitch done in three or four shades, which gives a woven ef-fect, or even the old-fashioned briar stitch with the centre catcht in a contrasting color.

Embroidered Lingerie Ties

THE introduction of color in so many summer things is echoed prettily in an eccasional one of the lingerie ties which are so greatly in evidence. Upon wide white ties the ends are turned into butterflies of color, a delicate effect got by doing the work eyelot fashion in colored thread.

The West Wind and the Sea

OVER the waves,
Sweet sounds come to me;
"Tis the song of the mermaids,
Under the sea; And the chorus is sung. So high and free, By the wild west wind,

In caves of pearl. At Neptune's feet; The mermaids chant their Couplets sweet; With ever the chorus, high and free, Of the wild west wind And the dashing sea.

Treasures of shells. And jewels, untoid— Are brought to the caves, ity fishes of gold; And tales of these Are told to me

And the dashing sea.

y the wild west wind And the c shing sea. Hing on! Oh mermaids,
Your plaintive strain,
With dreams of splendor
Fill my brain;
But for are and strength!
Oh give to me,
The song of the west wind
And of the sea!

Kitchen C urtains

A TTRACTIVE, inexpensive assh curtains for the kitchen may be made of scrim or even cheese-cloth, either the pure white or the soft, nellow tint, which is just one remove from biscuit color one way and just one from white the other way.

Lay hems along the front and bottom, an inch to two incluss wide, and hemstitch in a very open way, taking enough threads in a sitch to make the drawn part quite open.

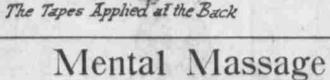

Hemslitching in color adds to the effectiveness; and if the work is done in wash-silk or cotton, the curtains may be washed repeatedly without any particular care.

Half Mourning Collars

POR the woman who is in haifmourning, come the prestlest linen collars of white, carefully shaped and edged with a narrow appiled hem of black.
Sometimes, as in the loveliest of the French mourning handkerchiefs, the collar is embroidered, the embroidery wandering off and on the black hem, and softening the sharp contrast.

Bias Collar Bands

I F YOUR separate coat collars of the area, take off the straight bands they are made up on and substitute bias bands instead. The blus band will adapt itself to the curve, and let the collar lie flat.

OME one in a recent article inquired, casually, why it was that, with all the talk of massage and oxteopathy, no one had come forward with suggestions for applying these principles to the mind.

Somehow that idea of mental massage is wonderfully appealing in these days, when concentration is either accomplished strenuously, with nerveracking results, or else seems trying to prove itself a lost art.

In either case, mental massage should prove a benefit—as an influence toward relaxation in the one instance, as stimulation in the other.

How to get it? Many of us are supplied with it already, in the shape of some comfortable member of the family, who, by the magic gift of tact—the best quality a would-be mental masseuse can have—has a way of defily easing the strained muscless of the mind. Take the times when the whole world goes wrong—apparently—and you go to that person with your tale of woe, believing yourself (as the best of us does at times) the most injured mortal under the canopy of heaven.

Are your woes enlarged upon, or, most aggravating of all, belittled? Not a bli of it. First a ready sympathy draws your story from you (that's getting you relaxed—the first step), then a different point of view may be suggested so subtly that you've half a mind you did it yourself—the masseuse is beginning her work.

In a little while you are quits cheera little while you are quite cheertol again.

Take the opposite case: When you are disposed to let opportunity after opportunity go by—mental laxiness having its own way with you and ruining your chances of big success.

Along comes some shock—something eminently disagreeable—and startles, stimulates you out of your com-

You take that trouble to your confidence, who manipulates you mentally until, instead of feeling mingled tally until, instead of feeling mingled resentment and depression, you are on fire with ambition to "make good." It's a pure case of mental massage—but a vasely different treatment from the other.

But the poor masseuse is tired out from her work—there's nothing that takes it out of you like pouring your vitality into another person's body or spirit. The chances are, too, that she's entirely unappreciated, unlike the woman who is paid for her services in body massage. Probably you feel that you've done it all yourself, any way—"she didn't do anything but listen," you say half abologetically to yourself, and dismiss her part of the question without further thought. But, probably, at some future date, mental massage will be a recognized factor, and the masseuse will come to be appreciated and paid.

An Object Lesson

THERE'S a little English story going the rounds which is a tremendous object lesson to most of us homebodies: An old Frenchman stepped into a crowded car and a young girl sprang up, urging him, pleasantly, to take her place. As he sank into it, he said, gratefully:

"Ah, mademoiselle, if you are so kind to a stranger, what must you be at to a stranger, what must you be at