WOMAN'S LONG SUPPLICATION FINALLY REWARDED IN A NOVEL MANNER.

Eighteen years of prayer and supplication finally won for Miss Maria Jessop of Chicago a husband, but it took the strength of her good right arm, the total wreck of an image and the severe wounding of R. F. Costantino, an Italian, to bring about the happy result. Maria is a woman of some 38 summers. It is the custom of her country not only to marry, but to marry young. When, at the age of 23 years, Maria found herself still in the enjoyment of simple blessedness, she considered that she was on the waiting list, and thought in all probability she would remain there unless she took immediate steps to remedy the situation. She purchased a plaster of Paris image of a saint and set it up in her apartment. Daily, in the morning and again in the evening, she made obeisance to the graven likeness for fifteen years and was still a spinster. Maria cast about her for the cause of the distressing state of affairs. She gazed into the mirror and found that despite the flight of time she was still fair to gaze upon. In the streets were many men who were doubtless single and probably eligible. The bust met her gaze. She was angry at the image because it had not brought her a husband. She grasped it in her hand and huried it through the window. There was a crash of broken glass, a sickening thud, a groan, the sound of plaster of Paris breaking upon the stone—and all was still. Maria rushed to the window and looked out. In the court at the rear of her home a small crowd was collecting about the prostrate form of a man. Persons were hurrying for a doctor. Small boys were liberally helping themselves to vegetables in the cart of the wounded man. Fragments of the image lying in the vicinity told the tale. Then the wounded man slowly opened his eyes and his gaze met that of Maria Jessop. It was all over in a minute—he loved her, though she had huried the missile that laid him low. Costantino, the fruit dealer, did not die. He was nursed back to life by the hand that wounded him. Yesterday he was able to sit up, and notice things, and the first thing he noticed was Maria. A license was procured for their wedding. They left for Detroit, where they will live—Chicago Inter-Ocean.
