HEROES WHO LOVED MULES! Noted Generals Who Had a Soft

The following stories are verified by Capal tain Beckwith, who was General Grant's secret cipher telegraph operator during the Beckwith was known as "Grant's Shadew," and was in constant communication with the leader from first Paradox.

After the surrender of Lee, Grant returned to Petersburg, where his army and staff were located. An immense campfire was burning, about which were gathered the men, all anxiously awaiting the general, and especially anxious to hear his first words, which presumably would concern the recent act which rang down the curtain of the great strife and spread the white cutain of peace.

The general drew near, with head bent as though with the weight of heavy thought, the solemnity of affairs and the future disposal of things. The men approached nearer. Every word which might fall from the great leader's lips would be of import, worth hearing, as well as worth treasuring for all time to come.

Suddenly Grant turned to one of his toen and asked in that low tone of voice, that one which all who knew him well have kept in their minds for years: "Ingails, remember that white mule we had down in Texas?" "I do, perfectly well."

"I wonder what has become of that mule ?" "I never heard, general," returned Ingalls.

And the great general walked away as If in a deep and brown study. Those were the first words from Grant's lips addressed to his comrades after the surrender of hat other great general-Lee. naturally should it not be in the mind of that other great general who was aversto wearing the insignia of his high rank? A thin, erect man, seated upon a bony. rangy horse, drew near the mule quarters of the great army. His uniform was seedy. his slouch hat was battered out of shape and flapped low over his brow, and deepsset eyes. He looked like a cashiered soldier run down at the heels and disreputable to say the least. Suddenly he reined his horse, "lifted his head and fastened his eyes angrily, re-provingly, upon a mule driver who was beating without mercy one of the longcared equine paradoxes. The mounted man gritted his teeth and muttered a curse under his scraggy beard. He was angry. angry away through to his marrow. When this particular general got angry things had to stir.

"Stop that, you fool!" came angrie from his lips. "Stop what"" returned the mule driver ar the whip fell again. "Stop beating that mule-" "Umph! Who in thunder are you?"

"General Sherman-" "Umph! Half a dozen other old bums depths of the general's eyes that held the cruel whip in air. The rude driver was not like the others, though he looked
