Nature passes no act without affixing the penalty for its violation. When she is outraged she wi', have her penalty, although it takes a life. When through violation of her immutable laws in early life or later excesses, man wastes away his nerve and bodily vigor, he is then compelled to strugglo under the disadvantages which impede his progress and defout his ends. He can scarcely hope to compete with those of his follows who, possessing equal opportunities, have all their faculties unimpare; and bodily energies at their best. When the vital organs are in a weakened and undeveloped state, which is inconsistent with health, strength and vigor, and which renders them unfit for the active duties and pleasures of life, they are nearing the danger point, and should secure immediate attention.

Millions of men have been wreaked on the rock of secret vice. The troubles is not so much that they have digressed from Nature's immutable law, but that they have permitted the trouble to insidiously progress and become more aggravated. They allow it to terminate, as uncured private diseases invariably do, in the horrors of lost manhood with its many depressing complications. This fact is usually responsible for about nine-tenths of the suffering. You should remember that private diseases are progressive in their nature.
