Toy Makers of the World Contribute to America

Large and small contribute to the toy counters of American storekeepers at Christmas time. Fifty thousand people find steady employment fashioning material delights in that greatest of all toy lands, Germany; half that number are likewise engaged in the next biggest toy center, France; Austria, England and America each has less than 10,000 such workers.

In the greatest of all toy centers, historic old Nuremberg, whence comes out a third of all the toys that are causing young hearts to glow all over America, not over 8,000 people find employment in the great doll factories, tin soldier presents and mechanical toy shops that are famous the world over and whose annual products are valued at about $5,000,000.

Years ago by far the greater portion of old Nuremberg's population—it is now 130,000—found its life bread and larger beer in toys. That was in the good old days when the home was the factory and the myriads of wooden trinkets were carved by hand. By and by there came a revolution in the industry; machinery for manufacturing dolls, doll houses, soldiers, hobby horses, planes and what not, was invented, big factories sprang up in the city itself and the suburbs and the tens of thousands of home workers disappeared to give place to thousands of factory hands. Since then sawer and better labor-saving inventions have further cut down the demand for manual labor until the sordid thousands of a decade or so ago have become much fewer in number.

Clung to Old Methods. Nuremberg and the other hamlets within its sphere of influence still cling to the old methods; Nuremberg, the doll city, largely so; while Kiefeld, hobby horse town; Haemmers, sailboat town; Schalkau, wooden gun town; Neufang, Noah's ark town; Pfeilsch, trumpet town; and all the rest of the peaceful settlements scattered throughout the Thuringian forest know not the whirr of a factory wheel or the clink of a cutting machine. All told, some 30,000 persons are directly employed the year through, and, excepting a thousand or two who work in doll factories in Sonneberg, the rest of this toy fashioning multitude do their work in their own homes, either for themselves and afterward selling their handiwork to buyers, or else as employees for wholesale toy dealers in Sonneberg, where all the toys made in Thuringian forests finally find their way, thence to be shipped at the psychological moment to England and America, and to the parts of the fatherland where toy makers are unknown in the flesh.

These two centers—Nuremberg and Sonneberg—together with the third and last German toy center, the villages in the Erz Gebirge, or Ore mountains, which form the Bohemian boundary line, furnish to the world 80 per cent of all the toys exported from Europe; and Europe furnishes the outside world with all but an insignificant percentage of its playthings. Therefore, it were well when you are wishing the German toy workers in Nuremberg and Sonneberg a merry Christmas, not to forget their 10,000 brethren of the Erz Gebirge, who dwell in contentedly in Omerath, Seifen, Waldkirchen and other remote and picturesque hamlets, day after day patiently turn out all manner of carved birds and beasts. And now merry Christmas, the toy makers of France, every mother's son of you, the humblest peasant among you, 35,000 strong.

Paris, of course, including the suburb of St. Cloud, is the French toy center, especially for the startling mechanical contrivances that are such a source of heavy expenditure to father just before Christmas and a corresponding source of joy to son and daughter on the immediately following gladsome day. Here there is one doll factory that gives steady employment to 2,000 hands, and a capital of nearly 4,000,000 francs, and annually turns out 20,000 dressed dolls, valued all the way from 30 centimes to 100 francs each, and 4,500,000 undressed dolls.

In the Provinces. But Paris does not have a monopoly of the $5,000,000 toy business of the French republic, even though it does turn out the new things every year, and long weeks before Christmas is thought of by the American boy or girl hold a toy exposition for the edification of the buyers for wholesale houses in England and this country. The provinces, especially those bordering on Switzerland and Germany, have their thousands of toy makers, and here it is that the industries immediately furnish, and while they fashion grand tin horses and brave soldiers, flying fish and meek-eyed cows, teach the world a lesson in economy. For, be it known, the tens of thousands of toys yearly turned out by these provincials are made almost entirely out of sawdust and canned goods boxes collected in America, France and England by iron-wrang men, shipped to the country about Nancy and later on sent back by that city's wholesale toy dealers to the very localities where they were first flung on the scrap heap.

A merry Christmas to these ingenious peasants. Their ingenuity will undoubtedly make many a world youngster exceedingly happy as he enthusiastically licks the paint off his new bauble and exposes to view the tell-tale legend underneath—"Sardines; Best Grade." And, likewise, an equally hearty merry Christmas to the wood toy carvers in the Vosges and in Jura, and the hundreds of fashioners of stone marbles—the real boy's delight—in the Cevennes, down in the south of France, a few miles back from the shores of the blue Mediterranean. Again, a very merry Christmas to one and all of France's 35,000 toy makers, for since 1891, when they were prompted by competitions and expositions inaugurated by M. Lepine, chief of Paris police, the yearly value of their output has increased by millions of francs. In 1891 the increase was about 2,000,000 over 1900's production, which showed an increase of 4,000,000 over that of preceding years. And all this means greater joy to the American child, who finds the French toy at its best—which is another way of saying in its costliest form.

Where Toy Beasts Come From. Coming nearer home, the small boy who delights in sailing a trim yacht on a park pond, and who finds his heart's desire sticking from the top of his stocking, should not fail to wish the several thousand toy boat makers of "the light little island" a heartfelt merry Christmas. Haemmers, a hamlet in Germany, far from a body of water bigger than an American "creek," spends years in carving thousands of miniature sailboats and warships, but were it not for the assistance of their English cousins, the inhabitants of Haemmers could not begin to fill the wants of Yankee land in this particular. Hence thousands—literally shiploads—of toy boats reach these shores every year from England, where factories have been busily running since last Christmas to meet the
