THE RELIABLE SPECIALISTS BRONCHITIS AND ITS DANGEROUS DEVELOPMENTS

We have what may be termed two skins—an outside or covering skin, and an inside or lining skin. The inside or lining skin is designated as nuccous membrane and lines the respiratory organs, including the nose, throat, bronchial tubes and lungs as well as the stomach, liver, kidneys and pelvic organs. When this lining in the nose and throat becomes inflamed or diseased through contracting a cold, it produces what is commonly called a catarrhal condition, and when neglected, and the inflammation invades the bronchial tubes, leading to the lungs, which is really an extension of the trouble, it is called Bronchitis, and is a serious aliment, as it paves the way for Precumenta, Consumption and other pulmonary troubles.

The nervous system controls all the functions of the human body. Every minute vessel which permeates it contracts and expands under its influence. If that portion of the nervous system which presides over the circulation of the blood in the nucous membranes of the body become weakened and diseased, and allows more blood than normal to pass into the capillary vessels, it results in a congested condition of the mucous membrane, leaving it very susceptible to infection by disease germs. The blood vessels of the mucus membrane lose their contractile power in this event when exposed to cold, hence the sufferer "catches cold," as it is termed, very easily when it is inflamed and diseased; they become flabby and gorged with blood. This causes a watery fluid to exude, commonly called mucous.

When the trouble is confined principally to the respiratory organs it.

the sufferer "catches cold," as it is termed, very easily when it is inflamed and diseased; they become flabby and gorged with blood. This causes a watery fluid to exude, commonly called mucous.

When the trouble is confined principally to the respiratory organs it often makes its appearance with a slight cough, also frequently without it. There is usually more or less hawking and spitting of white, stringy mucous from the throat, running of the nose and watery eyes. When neglected other complications ensue and the mucous membrane is left in such a weak-ened, distended and relaxed condition that it is predisposed to fresh attacks. The blood vessels become expanded, with no tendency to return to their natural elastic condition. The inflamed membrane becomes diseased, producing canker sores in the mouth, serious derangements in the throat, hoarseness and vocal weakness in the larynx, soreness through the chest, someties accompanied by a mild or desperate cough, atomach becomes disturbed, producing dyspepsia as well as other functional derangements of the bladder, kidneys and other organs. Various afflictions, frequently classified as distinct diseases and attributed to some other cause, are directly traceable to it. Sufferers are prone to neglect Fronchitis and its ally, Catarrh, because they do not immediately manifest violent and alarming symptoms and procrastinate until it gets thoroughly seated and entrenched in the system, rendering a cure tedious, difficuit and expensive, especially when it terminates in Consumption, which is often the clase.
