OMAHA AS A DISTRIBUTING CENTER

Time is an essential element of all trade contracts. Every merchant in the nation realizes that fact and Omaha profits by it. The patron of an Omaha jobber knows, by experience or by a glance at the map, that Omaha occupies a commanding position as a distributing point for the vast and growing empire west of the Mississippi. The traffic and transportation interests of Omaha are of gigantic proportions, involving a system of facilities superior to that of most American cities and affording Omaha and its varied industrial and commercial enterprises superior advantages in both freight shipment and passenger travel.

It requires but a glance at any railroad map to furnish proof that Omaha stands as the hub of a region boundless in its resources and girdled with a system of railroads that makes it possible for every resident of the country tributary to feel like a next door neighbor. The territory covering Nebraska, the western half of Iowa, the northern half of Kansas and the Northern half of Missouri, all directly local and tributary to Omaha, is supplied with 19,500 miles of railroad, every train of which is operated on a schedule with Omaha as an originating point for passenger travel and freight traffic.

But the jobbing business of Omaha is not confined to local territory. Enterprising merchants and manufacturers have extended Omaha's trade until Omaha salesmen are now making regular calls upon merchants in all the territory between the Mississippi and the Pacific. In this region is Colorado with 5,162 miles of railways; Utah with 1,935 miles; Idaho,
