Sixtieth congress, and the occupancy of this fulding early in the new year reflects the growth of the country in fifty years. The capitol building has grown wholly inadequate for the uses intended. By reason of the admission of new states and the corresponding growth of the membership of the house and the necessary enlargement tions, the house office building became s necessity and the congress appreciating the demands of the public business appropriated sufficient money to make possible this splendid structure which is now ready for ecupancy. A structure that has not its counterpart in the world and devoted wholly to legislative purposes. This building provides not only individual rooms for the nearly 400 members in the lower branch of the national legislature but is fitted with a number of fine com mittee rooms, light and airy, over which many of the old committees of the house are good-naturedly fighting for.

The completion of this building long be fore it was ever thought the building could be erected is due to the administrative ability and to the genius of Elliott Woods, the superintendent of the capitol and the grounds surrounding the temple of national legislation. Mr. Woods has overcome almost insurmountable obstacles and takes front rank among the great builders of the
