It must not be forgotten that the manifestation of power by railroad labor is to be looked for not so much in the wording of schedules and agreements as it is in what the managements of railroads under pressure feel constrained to cetrain from doing. Loyalty then, as applied to the railroad ervice, means the safety of the traveling sublic in so far as the human safeguards an be depended upon. Again, comparing he service as it actually is with what it night be, loyalty means the elimination of numerous petty delays and at times serious blockades which, at the present day on many railroads, are so annoying to the traveling public. As an illustration let us take the following incident, which is almost an everyday occurrence:

Freight train No. 1. pulls into a yard a few miles outside the terminal. The train and engine crew are on overtime; that is to say, every hour they remain out on the road means a great many dollars in wages over and above their regular pay. Before long another freight train, No. 2, overtakes No. 1. Instead of pulling into the yard and doing its work in turn, this second train runs up the main line and backs in ahead of train No. 1, thus putting it in a pocket. In this way train No. 1 is delayed three or four hours, thus causing the engine to be late for the return service. and altogether entails upon the railroad an
