Oyster season opens Thursday. There is no "r" in August, but there is in Thurs-

Why the season should open more than four days before September 1 is a matter of mystery. It is believed the oyster growers have opened the season early because some of the planets are ahead of time in their courses, or else because frost has been reported in Minnesota. Anyway, the dealers have announcements out telling the purblic that it can get a certain fat marine bivalve muliosk of the genus ostrea for so much per can.

The dealers also explain that "the presidential campaign is going to make a big oyster season." This they refuse to back up with arguments, but figure that oysters will be a little higher in price.

Farewell has been said to the "bulk oveter"-the oyster who traveled around the world in pails and sat around on the sawdust floors of butcher shops. The pure food laws have been largely responsible for the bucket oyster hunting another country, where civilization is not so far advanced. The high-class dealers will sell only, in large and small-sized cans, or from a sealed tin can holding one gallon. Instead of the modest old tin oyster cans used by the better class of dealers for the last quarter of a century, bright lithographs appear on the cane, which don't make the oysters any better, but those from some growers and dealers have a long "guarantee," while others have a few sections of famous cook books printed on the labels telling how to cook and serve oysters. How much the retailers will charge for the cans is a matter of conjecture, but it is supposed the largest size, holding two
