Women in Cookery. Miss Bella Bruce of the Household science school at the Women's exchange, New York, says that whatever people may say as to modern women not being domestic and that they detest cooking more than anything connected with housekeep inv. It is a fact that many wealthy women really attend the cooking school, not for be sake of doing something different, but up meals, and show themselves most substance entering into the food supplies teachable and earnest. Nor would their more intelligent fathers and brothers wish them to give up their larger life. But there is a growing discontent with the results that can be shown by college bred women.

More and more clearty is it being seen that men and women are different and their work in the average course of life is different. Not that the training of women should be any less thorough than that of men or any less varied and developing. But as nine-tenths of the women of each generation marry and have homes and children to care for, the more thoughtful minds among us are saking, "How can we so educate our daughters that they shall be able to earn financial independence when necessary and yet be better wives and mothers for having been years after his appointment.
