FOSSILS FROM THE WEST

Yale Expedition Secures Three Tons from Finds in Nebraska and Wyoming.

The Yale geologists who have been exploring the western part of the country the past summer for specimens have returned to Peabody museum, bringing with them three tons of fossils. This is the first expedition sent out from Yale in fifteen years.
Prof. R. E. Lull, who is Yale's authority on vertebrate paleontology, and Hugh Gibb, who has charge of all the preparatory work on the specimens mounted at the museum, headed the expedition that left New Haven for Lusk, Wyo., on June 12. The first Yale geological camp was established at Spanish Diggins, in Laramie county, near Laramie Peak, where the surrounding country is rich in Indian relics. According to the geologists, it was in this region that the predecessors of the modern Sioux Indians roamed in prehistoric times, the remains of their populous villages being found in the form of circles of stones by means of which the skin coverings of their tipis or lodges were kept in position. Stone implements used in those times are abundant there and after two days' prospecting the Yale scientists collected some 200 of these specimens.

As the Yale party was primarily in search of vertebrate fossils, the Yale camp was soon removed to the valley of the Big Muddy creek. In the sandstone of which are to be found the bones of the ancient plains-dwelling animals, mainly camels, rhinoceroses and oreodonts, the last being a species of hoofed creatures possessing certain characteristics of the ruminants and pigs, which have no present day relatives.
Camps were also established beside the Niobrara river, upon the Cook ranch, through whose courtesy the Yale explorers were permitted to dig for fossils in the Agate Spring quarries, which contain the most remarkable assemblage of fossil bones thus far discovered in the world. Here the Yale geologists unearthed skeletons of two or more young twin-born rhinoceroses, one of which will probably be mounted and placed in the Peabody museum, besides numerous bones of moropus, a form allied to the odd-toed ungulates, and remains of the dinohyrus, a giant pig standing six feet, next in size to the elephants.

The "Devil's Corkscrew" was one of the interesting finds of the Yale investigators, and plays the role of the fossil plant. This is described as a fossil plant, or filled-in burrow of a primitive rodent, a progenitor of the up-to-date beaver.
Several specimens of a primitive camel about the size of a sheep was also secured through the courtesy of Prof. F. B. Loomis of Amherst, who directed the Yale explorers to a spot somewhat removed from the famous agate quarries, where skeletons of a part of a herd had been unearthed. While these two Yale professors were gathering specimens of vertebrate fossils, Prof. Charles Schuchert, curator of the Peabody museum, was likewise prospecting for invertebrate fossils at the island of Anticosti, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

From there Prof. Schuchert during the summer gathered more than 1,000 pounds of fossils, which will be placed also in the museum collection. The museum also received as the result of a summer's work of one of the students, W. H. Tweenhofel, 18, nine boxes of specimens from the Arisaig coast of Nova Scotia. These are illustrations of the marine life of Silurian time in the St. Lawrence region.
When the new specimens collected this year have been assorted, registered and placed on exhibition, Yale will have a big display as a result of the first summer spent in research since the days of the late Prof. Marsh, who contributed tons of fossils to the museum. Another addition to the collection has just been presented to the museum. This is the skull of an Inca, who lived in the second era of Peruvian civilization. The skull was unearthed in a burial plot that had not been in use for more than 400 years by William Pratt of Meriden, while traveling through Peru more than fifty years ago—New York Herald.

"BAD MEN" WITH NERVES
Kinch West Johnson Easily Started and Blood Made Frank James Faint.
The other day I glanced casually over the register of a hotel and read the name "Kinch West Johnson." It may be that I was the only man in New York outside the person who signed the register that would have taken an interest in the signature, and yet Kinch West was on the point of putting my light out once. He was an Indian territory character in the early '70s, and stopped a night with me when I was a boy and living under the parental roof, and he interested me greatly by telling me of his adventures in the southwest.
Five years later I was riding on a railway train, approaching Denison, Tex., and I saw him. Being young and foolish, I blurted out on the back and said: "Hello, Mr. West! I'm glad to see you." Say, Kinch's smoke wagons were all over me in a minute. Until he recognized me he scowled, and after that he laughed heartily. At Denison he wrung my hand and said: "Good-by, boy and don't say anything about my being here."
Naturally, I hunted up Kinch West Johnson, and what do you suppose he was? A drummer. A mild-mannered boy, who was glad to acknowledge that the redoubtable Kinch West was his grandfather. And he confessed to me that he had never owned a gun in his life.
One story of this kind leads to another. I recalled Frank James almost as soon as I had listened to young Johnson's story of how little use he had for a gun. About fourteen years ago I happened to be present at the fair grounds in St. Louis when Frank James, along with a number of others, was vaccinated in obedience to the law. Frank fainted as soon as the knife went into his flesh.

"I ought not have looked," he explained to me. "I never could bear the sight of blood."—New York Telegraph.

An Uncertain Speculation.
"Jane has a caustic tongue. I asked her the other day why she didn't marry some old man for his money."
"What did she say?"
"She said the increase in the duration of human life and the depression in stocks made the speculation too uncertain. But she added that she would marry a rich old man under one condition."
"What was that?"
"He must be a chronic aeroplanist."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.
