In this experience, relates Horatio Wood in Lippincott's, I have met various guides whose personalities have een sufficently picturesque to be worthy of note.

> Peter, a Canadian guide whom I have often employed, is remarkable for the picturesqueness of his scanty English, which he has picked up about the wharves of Quebec. The English "h" is his in all its additions and elisions, while his only adverb of intensification is "like 'ell"; a woman "purty" or "ugly" "like 'eil"; winter is cold like 'ell''; summer is "'ot like 'ell." The French Canadian canoemen are remarkable for their musical aptitude. Once, when returning to camp from the far side of the lake, in the late gloaming, I heard them singing an old Canadian boat song, the music of which is not in print. The blended voices grew louder and louder as the boat drew nearer, rising and falling in in its mingling of the music of the late medieval France with the voices of the forest of the north. For some reason our commandant felt impelled to leave the open valley and climb the steep Chesos (Jesus) mountain. 12 o'clock p. m. we found that in some manner the plugs of our water casks had been drawn, so that we had just enough water left to make a cup of coffee in the morning. We could not reach the Rio Grande south of us because of impassable precipices. Finally it was decided to let July Jesus decide on the direction in which we should proceed, although he had never north, directly away from the river. We people who have money to spend.
