sovereign and afflicted. There is a stoop to the shoulders, a hang to the whole figure that speaks eloquently of the weight of years and sorrows, but there is still fight in the flesh of the eyes and the firm grip of the hand that warns the unwary that Francis Joseph, although he may have relinquished the reins of active government to the heir presumptive, is nevertheless still a man to be reckoned with.

Bader's Day Box. The emperor is still every inch a soldier and he is very fond of paying surprise visits to garrisons and barracks. He is a stern disciplinarian and does not conceal the fact that he believes he has the finest soldiers in the world, not even excepting the Germans. In this he is supported by many experts. It is not more than a week since, apropos of the present crisis, one famous military authority expressed the opinion in print that no better raw material existed in Europe than some of the races of which the Austrian army is composed. Outwardly and to the mere layman there is surely no comparison between the Hungarians and the Boers, with their fire and dash and the cold, phlegmatic Germans over whom Emperor William II rules.

Archduke Francis Ferdinand, heir presumptive to the throne, has taken an appreciable jump in popularity in the last six months. This is, of course, due to the progress of events in which he is supposed to have had a directing hand. And a strong and heavy hand it has proved to be. "After him the deluge" has been a well nigh universal way of referring to the Austrian emperor and the dual monarchy for years past, but he is a rash man who would make that prophecy today. In other words, the archduke has demonstrated a quite unexpected amount of strength and ability and Austria-Hungary is exulting accordingly. Today Archduke Ferdinand is almost as popular as his aged uncle. Whether or not it is the fleeting popularity of the man of the hour or of a more durable lasting brand it is hard to say, but he has already given excellent reason for supposing that if she aspires to hold her own it is to do so, but if she aspires to hold her own it is essential before all things to be able to "talk literature." She who has not at least a superficial knowledge of the poems from Chaucer to Swinburne is bound to find herself out of the social cold.
