Opening of Parliament

broke with the weight of men and came down on the heads of those below. Dogs, the midnight scavengers of the city, disassembled in the center of the road where they were continually chased by the officers; and the pigeons of the mosque, upset by the influx of unwelcome visitors, fluttered around us inquiringly.

A few moments before 11 a trumpet sounded and some excitement was exhibited as the first member of Parliament escorted by two men bearing banners, descended from his carriage and walked down the road. The other members followed at some distance, some in long priestly robes of black, green or purple embroidered in gold; some wearing the fez and black coat and others in Arab costume.

As the deputies walked down many of them were recognized and loudly cheered by the crowd of young men and students near the Parliament building. The trumpet sounded again and the ambassadors arrived, each attended by a dragoman and kavars, making a splendid display in their gold braided state uniforms, while the French and American ambassadors looked plain in comparison.

A dozen royal carriages, accompanied by a number of mounted officials and eunuchs, came slowly drawn by magnificent horses. The women of the harem, however, were not allowed to proceed further, and the officers held a hasty consultation as to how to dispose of them. After some delay the carriages were ordered to drive in the behind the soldiers on either side of the road, where they remained until the ceremony was over, the occupants of the carriage being quite unable to see anything of course but the backs and legs of the men.

At 12:50 two soldiers came running down the road. They gave the word to an officer, who signalled to a trumpeter; the trumpet sounded and almost immediately a company of lancers galloped by. The trumpet sounded again and as the bands struck up the Turkish national march, the imperial state carriage, a hooded victoria, with the sultan, his favorite son and the grand vicar came by at a quick pace drawn by four handsome light colored horses. Then came the remainder of the royal procession in carriages, followed by another company of lancers on gray horses; the bands now played the new constitutional march and the vast crowd raised three cheers.

As the sultan entered the Parliament house the imperial crimson flag was run up on the flagstaff, and the crowd, believing the rumor that the sultan would return by water to Yildiz, began to disperse slowly. We, however, awaited the signal that Parliament was declared in session, and two men stationed on the very summit of St. Sophia were prepared to signal the news to the ships with a white flag.

In about half an hour's time a trumpet sounded; immediately the men waved their flag and the salute of 101 guns commenced, signifying that the sultan had publicly declared himself a constitutional monarch. Another pause of half an hour and the lancers got into position; the sultan came out and took his seat in the carriage and the royal procession opened, and two men stationed on the very summit of St. Sophia were prepared to signal the news to the ships with a white flag.
