looks well, and is a great dust collector. A simple cased opening is much to be preferred, or if some dignity is desired, it looks well to place on each side of the opening a neat column of the Ionic order of architecture, extending either from the floor or a pedestal to the top of the opening. There should always be a light in all entrance doors, not only that one may see whom they are going to admit, but placing a glass in the door makes it serve as another window.

Question—Can you give some advice on the proper grouping of windows? Where is art glass appropriate?

Answer—Very few people give serious consideration to the design and location of the windows. Windows should be located with reference to the wall space within and the exterior design of the house. To obtain a successful arrangement both inside and out, sometimes presents difficult problems, which only a man of considerable practical experience can solve. This is why the windows are placed in the exterior of homes in such a haphazard manner, with no apparent effort to keep them in harmony with each other, or to obtain a well balanced symmetrical design.

Windows on the second floor should, when possible, be placed directly over the windows on the first floor. When this is not possible, then they should be placed over the center of the spaces between windows on the first floor. A window on the second floor lapping half one side of a window on the first floor always looks very unsightly. Windows should never be made too narrow or too tall. A window three feet wide and five feet high, with a sill two feet from the floor is a well proportioned window and when this size is adopted it would be best to use it throughout the house, making all the windows the same size, with the possible exception of the bath room window and the front parlor window. By placing windows in groups of two or three, a very pleasing appearance can often be obtained, which breaks away from the general monotony of individual windows. A very pretty group, known as the Palladian window (so called because it is similar to a group of windows designed by the famous Italian architect known by that name) is composed of one large window about four and a half feet wide in the center, with two narrow windows joining it on each side and either a semi-circular window or an elliptical window over all three, the latter having a leaded glass design in it. This makes a very handsome group when properly designed and located. It looks especially well upon a broad stairway landing where it can be seen to good effect from the hall. Art glass can often be used in a window of this character, but here there is danger. Art glass, when properly designed and studied, with reference to the other decorations of the room and its relation to the sun, gives a very rich and handsome effect, but when colors are used in it that do not blend or harmonize with the wall paper, rugs and general decorations of the room, or where very bright glass is used on the sunny side of the house, the effect is not pleasing to contemplate. The colored light which radiates from an art glass window becomes just as much a part of the color scheme of that room as its wall decorations; in fact, has much to do with giving a proper hue to the latter.

Question—Can you give me a few pointers on the planning of bath-rooms in your Bee articles?

Answer—This is probably one of the most ill treated rooms in a house. It is always crowded in as though it were an after consideration. Of course, in a very small home, a small bath room is entirely excusable, for the space is valuable for other

ROOMER SWIPES THE SPOONS

Decamps in Middle of Night with Silverware of His Landlord.

"Be careful," says J. E. Renfrow, 1112 North Seventeenth street, "that your roomers don't steal your silverware and skip during the night."

Renfrow told the police Saturday that a man to whom he had rented a room arose in the middle of the night, helped himself to half a dozen solid silver spoons and disappeared. A description of the board-jumping, spoon-fishing person is now in the possession of the police, who hope to entertain him in jail before he leaves town.
