INVITATIONS IN WRITING

My dear Mr. and Mrs. Brown:—

Our daughter, Helen Elizabeth, is to be married next Tuesday evening, May 25, at half after eight o'clock, at our home, to Mr. James Andrew Gardner. Mrs. Smith and I will esteem it an honor to have you present at the ceremony and for the in-

The later summer styles, with their full-flounced skirts and intricate trimmings, are admirably suited for the batistes and mulls and lawns, and for the bride who cherishes no sentiment for her wedding gown they are admirably suited also to use for subsequent occasions. Among the developments of the present season that come to the rescue of the more severe wedding gowns is a supplement resembling a court mantie as much as anything clse. It is attached to the shoulders and hange in long, graceful, sweeping folds back over the train. Sometimes it forms the train and is independent of the gown itself. This, of course, goes with the satins and heavier silks and it is more or less elaborately trimmed, hand embroldery affording the most effective adornment. It should be superfluous to caution against any but the most stately of brides using such a wedding gown.

Wedding.

The fancy of the June bride seems to have wandered far this season from the bench of the gold or silversmith, the studio or the novelty cases of the jeweler's shop, in sciecting the souvenirs for her attendants. So widely has she departed from the old custom of giving something that might be kept always, that her selections might almost be criticised as inappropriate, so transient must be their service as reminders of the bride and her wedding day.

The new parasol in all its dainty extremes, the dainty, fragile little fan, two or three pairs of gloves, a suit of very fine lingerie and a box of silk hosiery are among the choice just now.

LINGERIE SHOWS PERSONALITY

Daintiness and Refinement or Lack of These Revealed by Choice Made. Into no part of all her trousseau does the bride put her own personality as into her lingerie. If she is dainty and refined in ber tastes, here it will assert itself, and if she is content with the common things, here she will be content to substitute musin and Hamburg and raw seams for cambric, hand embroidery and lace. It is only the comparatively few and the privileged few at that, who may select their lingerie from the tempting assortment now offered n any of the better stores, but every one s privileged to look and to admire and to take away all the ideas they are capable f carrying.

In our grandmothers' day it was counted scential to have a dozen suits of under ear in the trousseau, but the girl of today as reduced the standard to half that alwance, though many have more. There reason for this, and it is found in the cessant changing of fashions. Fullness this spring is exchanged for scantiness in the summer. Then, too, the advent of the silk betticoat and the liste and silk knitted things has done away with the necessity of the many white things. Moreover, the general style is developed in underwear just as in other garments. Where the kimono effect held sway last year the ompire and princess are in vogue this season manifesting themselves distinctly in the cut and general style of undergarments. All women are, or should be, familiar with the deterioration of white goods that lie packed away "done up," and so the trouseau supply does not exceed what is likely be worn out.
