This they were willing ing the position of the other. Then to do for a sum that would enable them the next day the whole thing would be to continue their work upon the secret plans, and which they further agreed to turn over to the government. They received in reply a curt refusal to consider the proposition, nor did it have time to send a board to Ohio to investigate the claims of "a couple of cranks."

the part of the government that the neither brother could have mastered the Wright brothers came by appointment to the residence of Charles R. Flint of New York. Mr. Flint had long been impressed matters concerning war. It was he who, prior to the outbreak of the Spanishoptions on many vessels then under conthe Russo-Japanese war.

A Friend Indeed.

He had his eye on the Wright brothers from the beginning. So it happened that against a twenty-mile an hour wind. It is much more probable, however, that their eager minds were simply seizing upon a new idea, as the case has been so often before.

Working Together.

They took hold of the thing together They had done everything together from the days of their childhood, when Wilbur, the older by four years, used to "make up" stories and pour them out in a stream for the entertainment of Orville, each separate story ending, "and then the boiler burst. For five years they studied the theory of the flying-machine at odd times. But still for fun. In the meantime they kept up their bleycle business, earning a fair in come, and living regular, everyday, reasonable lives.

Although the most useful information they gained was obtained from books and from practical work on the problem carried on in their shop, they also observed the birds and the winds. For hours and hours of a Sunday afternoon they would lie on their backs on's hill outside Dayton and watch the buzzards soar on rising currents of air. Indeed it was their first idea that man would never do more in the air than soar in some sort of a gliding machine, just for fun, and as long as he could keep up. They also watched many other birds, both large and small, and were continually arguing about what they had seen. A man who has often been in their shop told me that more than once he had seen them rush to the window to have a look at a passing flock of birds. All this, together with their innumerable observations of small whirtwinds making their way through a cornfield, or across a dusty road did not help materially toward the solution of the problem. But, according to Orville Wright, himself, it helped to keep their

So far they had given about the same amount of time and noney to flying as other boys do to a trip "up the lakes" or "to the World's fair," but now the matter assumed more serious proportions. One can imagine how many a father would have discouraged these strenuous absorbing efforts given to a mere amusement, would have advised Orville of Dayton, O., stood in the east "sticking to something that paid." But room of the White House and received the I cannot help believing that Bishop Wright medals and homage of a distinguished watched his boys' efforts to fly with as much interest as they felt themselves, and they needed his interest, for often they were discouraged.
