Cohan and Harris Minstrels at the

If minstrelsy is ever elaborated beyond the point attained in the current attraction at the Boyd it will cease to be minstrelsy, The advertisement for thirteen paving as indeed it does cease part of the time in itself, which announces an "entertainment embracing minstrelsy, burlesque and musical comedy." It might well have added vaudeville. Except for the first third of the program, were it not that George Evans s on the stage and that everyone is in black face, the casual spectator unaware of the name of the offering might not know it was a "minstre! show.

This is not to be considered as said in depreciation of the quality of the entertainment, for concerning that there will be riot of barbaric color, life, action, sweet singing and much clever funmaking will enjoy the performance to the utmost.

The program starts with some stereopon pictures depicting the history of minstrelsy and beginning with the Christy company of 1849. This is quickly over and the setting of the ensemble and the quite brilliant costumes of the massed blackfaced artists. In this part there occur half a dozen solos, noteworthy among, which were those by John P. Rogers, Vaughn Comfort and Will Oakland, although John King and Earl Benham scored equal popu-

On comes George Evans singing a ditty entitled "The Good Old Days," which is rather more clever than the ordinary topical verses. He follows with a monologue, which is funny enough, but he did really more artistic work in the last part of the performance, a thoroughly amusing buresque called "The Firemen's Picnic. Part II of the evening is pure Cohaneaque. There is dancing galore by various members of the company dressed as colored girls or pickaninnies, and the ginger and snap of these dancers is plainly derived from the young man whose chief strength outside his own dancing is in making others dance with great apparent zip and zest. In this part of the program also appears a feminine impersonator named Scott, than whom the famous Julian Eltinge is no better. So far as a performer of this kind can be liked by most men Scott will be liked. Evans holds the center of the stage most of the third part, but Sam Lee, as "Monk Anderson, a bad nigger," and Vaughn
