HE WAS A GAY OLD BOY

Late King of the Belgians as a G-Man, a Bomber and a Spender.

King Leopold's career of gallantry dates back to the days of Cora Pearl, that famous adventuress whose adventures amused Europe in the middle of the last century. The women involved since then range from ladies of his court to music hall performers. One was Clara Ward, Princess de Chimay, the American woman whose elopement from Brussels with the gypsy musician Rigo was a scandal ten years or so ago. She is said to have first lost caste in Belgian society through the king's indiscreet attentions to her. Then there was Mile. Cleo de Merode, the Parisian danseuse who wore her hair over her ears and who made a brief visit to New York in 1897. She thus describes her first encounter with the king: "One night at the Grand opera in the ballet of 'L'Africaine,' I was applauded by a tall man with a long white beard. I had done nothing extraordinary. I had not danced half so well as others. 'Unoriginal,' was my own comment to Vasquez, our ballet master, when I returned to the wings. 'Go back, quick,' said Vasquez. 'Dance again. It is the king of the Belgians. I danced again. He stood in the aisle waving his handkerchief. He kept me dancing for three quarters of an hour. How angry Vasquez was! The curtain couldn't be dropped while the king applauded. Vasquez scolded me for attracting so much attention, but was it my fault? The acquaintance with the king boosted Cleo at once into fame and fortune. It would be tiresome to enumerate a half the women who shared the favor of this merry monarch. There were stories of his lying hidden in a Swiss chalet for weeks while his ministers were anxiously seeking him to consult him on affairs of state. There is a story of a supper party which he gave in Paris to ten chorus girls of the Opera Comique, at the close of which each girl was presented with a diamond necklace of enormous value. There are the stories of his visits to London music halls, where ladies of the gay world conducted a beauty show in the foyers and where it is said he supplied unlimited champagne to all who attracted his attention. Mr. Stead dragged him into his 'Modern Minoatur' exposures in the Pall Mall Gazette. Perhaps Leopold's fame touched its lowest point when a notorious woman, a Mrs. Jef-

THIS CONVICT MADE GOOD

Trusty Who Ran Away and Earned Enough to Save Sister's Home.

Countless pages of romance have been written of convict heroes who redeemed themselves in their moral aspect by vicarious suffering and sacrifice to aid those who had befriended them. Benign philosophers have preached the doctrine that there is some residual good in every man, no matter how deep in sin he may have fallen. An English bishop took the word of a confessed thief as against the word of a minister of state because of faith in ultimate human goodness and he was justified. It is possible, and indeed in some phases of the matter customary, to become maudlin in sympathy for criminals. This, of course, is merely an excess of sentiment that is quite as unjustifiable as the lack of it.

Out from the whirl of our material life come occasionally strange stories of human goodness in those whom society has cast out. Convicts with hearts and loves and fine impulses are by no means rare. James G. Pogue was of this class. He was a convict in the Kansas state penitentiary at Lansing, where he was sent for grand larceny. It appears that his only sister had mortgaged her home to provide funds for his defense. But nevertheless he was sent to prison. His conduct as a convict was so good that he was made a trusty, an office that is something of a sinecure and is the only thing that makes prison life endurable to some men. But he never forgot the sacrifice made for him by his sister, and when the mortgage became due he knew that the little property must be sacrificed.

James Pogue wasn't a hero. He was a convict with years of imprisonment before him. As a trusty he could almost enjoy the freedom of the warden he knew that the future would be black and terrible. But there was his sister's home that was in danger because of his wrongdoing. After weighing all the elements of the problem James Pogue decided to make a supreme effort. He escaped from the prison and went to work. Wandering over the country, he did whatever his hands found to do. But always he saved and remitted regularly all he could spare. He worked in coal mines, in harvest fields, in railroad section gangs. Nothing was too hard for him, and through it all he never drank liquor or spent a cent that wasn't necessary. At last he had saved the amount needed to redeem his sister's home. In all it was a little more than $60. After that James Pogue could have gone far away and lost himself. But he didn't. He was no hero, but he knew his obligations to society and he was tired of being in constant dread of capture. When his purpose was achieved he again returned to prison and to a servitude worse than he had before known. He could not be a trusty again. He could have no benefit for good behavior. But somehow James Pogue rised out of the muck of dishonor and claims respect. If he isn't a hero he did something that was almost heroic—Kansas City Times.

Nests for Birds.

A building in San Diego, Cal., has a novel feature in the form of a business place for birds. It is in the business part of the city and was erected by Daniel Cohen, by whose order many places along the front of the house where there were depressions in the wall were only partly covered over with a sheet of cement, leaving a little room in each instance. These apartments were quickly discovered by birds, who "squatted" there and built their nests, forming an interesting colony. The idea is not unique, however, for a building similarly provided with apartments for birds exists at Los Angeles.

Pointed Paragraphs.

A small boy never looks comfortable in his Sunday clothes. You may feed your vanity by dining at an expensive restaurant. Sermons are based upon texts; political speeches upon precedents. Some times a man's wisdom is due to the possession of a clever wife. Fortunate is the husband who is allowed to spend a little of his own money. Even a politician would probably be honest if he could make more money that way. There comes a moment in every man's life when he regrets his inability to kick himself. It costs a young man more to educate himself than it cost his father to educate him. After a man has flattered a woman she begins to think it over and decides that he really meant it. It is harder for a woman to pray her husband into heaven than it is to map him into the other place. Many a man is apt to feel that you are not treating him right when you steer him up against a soda fountain.—Chicago News.
