Some Things You Want to Know

Trouble in Honduras.

President Davila of Honduras is reputed to be the most honest executive in Central America. That doesn't mean that he is a bed of roses. His term of office has been a year and the elections will be held some time in October, 1911. In all likelihood he will not be a candidate for re-election. If he can serve out his term without a revolution to mar his peaceful history, he will have every reason to congratulate himself. The main argument that is directed against him by his opponents is that he owes his place at the head of the state to Zelaya, and that he must therefore be a henchman of Nicaragua's fallen dictator.

There are several political parties in Honduras, as in all the other countries of the isthmus. As to principle or theories of government they do not profess any definite convictions. Any one of them coming into power might be relied upon to continue the government in practically the same way that Davila is now running it. The personality of the leaders therefore becomes important. The party which supports Policarpo Bonilla does not at present have any considerable degree of popularity. Its most conspicuous members, aside from Don Policarpo himself, are the brothers Utrilla, particularly Angel Utrilla, at one time minister to England, and again to the United States.

At the head of another and very influential party is Manuel Bonilla. He is no relative of Don Policarpo, although bearing the same family name. Some of the leaders of this party are in exile. Among them is Fausto Davila, a relative of the actual president of Honduras. Another conspicuous member of this faction, General Gallardo, has in his time held high positions under the government. He was for some time governor of Tegucigalpa, and then governor of the Atlantic coast. Gallardo took a leading part in the war with Nicaragua three years ago. He was in command of one of the armies operating against Zelaya. He withdrew from Honduras the same year, and has since been in the two countries and President Davila had come into office. Gallardo returned to Honduras about eighteen months ago, but his motives were suspected, and within two weeks he was notified by friends that the attempt was nearly so healthy for him as he thought. The hint was sufficient. Gallardo got a skiff and rowed hastily away to Belize.

Policarpo Bonilla was once president of Honduras. He was one of three presidents who, in 1888, founded the Republica Mayor, the Central American Republic. In this scheme he was associated with Zelaya of Nicaragua and Gutierrez of Salvador. The main feature of the union was a congress, which held its meetings in Managua, Spain even went so far as to recognize the existence of the Republica Mayor, and to accord to it a minister of state. The year Regalado started a revolution in Salvador against Gutierrez, which diverted Salvador from the union, and it promptly dissolved. This was Don Policarpo's principal exploit as a statesman.

Policarpo Bonilla is a man of genuine talent. He was originally a lawyer, and his political career was not very brilliant as a president came to an end in 1898, when Sierra was peacefully elected to succeed him. In 1902 Sierra declared in favor of free elections—that is, he proposed to allow all parties to present their candidates, and to surrender power to the man getting the majority of the vote. This sort of pronouncement might not awaken much interest in the United States, but it was quite novel enough in Central America to create considerable discussion. Some people urged Sierra to retain his hold on power.

Two candidates declared themselves—Arias and Manuel Bonilla. The contest was spirited. The influence of the government was thrown to Arias. In spite of all that Sierra could do to influence the issue, Manuel came in at the head of the poll. Sierra, whose honesty of purpose does not seem to be in question, even now by his political enemies, then took the course, starting in view of his previous liberal declarations, of cancelling the elections. He declared there had been frauds of a nature to vitiate the result entirely. This action, under the constitution, threw the election into the congress. At the same time Sierra arrested some of the most enterprising of the campaign managers of the Bonilla party, and put them in jail. Bonilla didn't wait for anything to happen to him. He departed with all haste for Amapala, whither his adherents proceeded to assemble. In the meantime congress had met and cast its vote for Arias. Bonilla felt he had been badly treated and adopted the Central American expedient of revolution. Within three weeks he succeeded in driving Arias out of office. There was some fierce fighting, in which Sierra took part in the conflict in person. When the result of the campaign was no longer in question, Sierra and Arias departed precipitately for Nicaragua.

Manuel Bonilla made a pretty good president. Two weeks after his inauguration his army was paid off and dismissed. His term was marked by the absence of military parade, the common characteristic of Central American satrapes. The president was even known to ride around on horseback unattended in the suburbs of his capital. The financial policies of the Bonilla administration were admirable. Peace and general prosperity prevailed throughout the country. In general, Manuel was not free from the vices of his predecessors. He could and did at times take things into his hands and smash the laws and the constitution with typical Central American recklessness. As for instance, when he caused the arrest and imprisonment of seven congressmen, on the charge of conspiracy, invading the halls of congress, and taking the members in the very place of assembly. By and by, clever as he was, Manuel made a mistake. He sent Timoteo Miralada as minister to Nicaragua. Miralada was an accomplished gentleman, no doubt, but he wasn't enough of a diplomatist to keep his chief from getting into trouble with Zelaya. In fact, Miralada advised Bonilla to enter into a hard-and-fast alliance with Zelaya, a project which Bonilla felt obliged to frown upon. That displeased Zelaya. From that day forth the ruler of Nicaragua set about to compass the destruction of the recalcitrant Honduran executive.

The opportunity which finally presented itself resulted from the announcement of the king of Spain's award in the Honduras-Nicaragua boundary dispute. The king gave the territory in dispute to Honduras, and Bonilla thought he was entitled to send troops into that district and take possession. His forces, however, were promptly attacked by Nicaraguan soldiers, as invaders of Nicaraguan soil. That was the beginning of hostilities. Zelaya was aided and abetted in his plans against Honduras by a number of "emigrados," such as General Rosales and General Constantino Filialon, and ex-President Sierra. These men took prominent part in raising and leading the army which was presently dispatched against Bonilla.

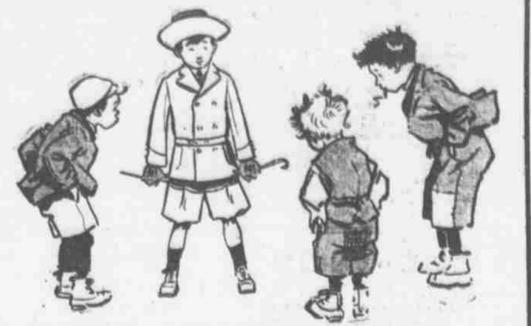

Though Salvador lent moral and material assistance to Honduras, the campaign resulted in the complete defeat of Bonilla. The Nicaraguan troops defeated the Salvadorans at Namasigala and at San Marcos. One feature of the military operations was the advance of the Nicaraguan army under General Estrada along the northern coast of Honduras. Estrada—the same, by the way, who is causing so much disturbance in Nicaragua just at this moment—captured Truxillo, Ceiba, Porto Cortez and San Pedro, and held the coast thenceforth until Davila, as provisional president, secured the withdrawal of the Nicaraguan forces from Honduran soil.

Bonilla, after many adventures made his way to Mexico. Then he went to Belize, where he now makes his home. His deposition left the presidential chair vacant. It was necessary to find somebody to fill it. To this task the "Junta" of Honduran exiles with the Nicaraguan army, addressed itself with great cheer, though but small success. This "Junta" had been formed early in the campaign, and was composed of Generals Rosales, Castro and Oqueli Bustillo. They agreed to hold the chairmanship in rotation, each one for fifteen days at a time. Naturally enough, this scheme produced discord. The longer they debated the choice of president the more it became apparent that their interests clashed, and the more obviously impossible became any eventual decision.

Zelaya, watching the process of events with an anxious eye, now attempted to forestall the "Junta's" determination. At his suggestion ex-President Sierra proclaimed himself president and raised his flag in Amapala. The news of this rising was received in Tegucigalpa with quite other effects than Zelaya anticipated. It instantly became apparent that unless Sierra were to return to power, some person who would be generally acceptable to the country must be put in the vacant presidency. While he has been able to prevent the actual outbreak of war, Davila has much to contend with in the constant menace implied in the presence of Manuel Bonilla in Belize, within easy striking distance of the Honduran coast. As long as Bonilla is there the risk of trouble is great, and that fact has sufficed to make Davila's way any but an easy one.

For these reasons Davila has been a sincere supporter of the plan whereby Washington hopes to prevent any further conflicts between the various Central American states. For these reasons, too, he abstained from meddling in the present Nicaraguan embroglio.

High School Boys to Take Count for the Commercial Club Are Instructed

"How old must a baby be to be counted?" With this question propounded in all seriousness to her by a high school boy census taker, Miss Jane MacMillan of the Commercial club's publicity bureau sat with wrinkled brow.

"How many is a baby, or how many babies will it take to count for a grown-up?" repeated the youthful statistician awaiting instructions.

"One baby is one, one, a unit in the body politic," explained Miss MacMillan, sternly. "Understand, one is one, every time."

The boy looked troubled yet.

"Well, then, list them according to lung power," replied the young woman in despair. "If a baby can pull two men in the grandstand with three on bases, then put him down for one. Here two equals one, see?"

The young hopefuls who are gathering the figures on Omaha's population for the Commercial club have an instinct for details. One bright lad inquired if he should count the squirrels in Hancock park, while another, who is working in the vicinity of Carter lake, would like to know if he can have time off each afternoon to do a bit of fishing.

Positive instructions have been issued to the youngsters that hockey playing and marbles will not be allowed to interfere with their work.

RAILS ENTER ELMWOOD PARK

Park Board Says it Tries to Supply Sufficient Drinking Cups for All.

The Park board and the street railway company have not been able to get together just in the way the Park board desired on the matter of building a "Y" into Elmwood park, but the work will proceed just the same, and the board is hopeful that cars will run to the park before the season is far advanced. The difference of opinion arose over just where the street railway takes the position that such seats could not be maintained for any length of time against vandalism, and if they attempted to provide the seats they would have to be renewed continually.

At the drinking fountains in the parks the board endeavored to provide sufficient cups for every ordinary demand, but finds that, even when the cups are attached by chains, people yank them off and carry them away or destroy them. "We renew the cups time after time," said President Berryman, "but we find there is no way to stop vicious people from snatching them off and destroying them or taking them away."

ROOSTER'S VICTIM CONVICTED

Elmer Wimmer, Whom Chanticleer Led Police to, Fined in Police Court.

Although the redoubtable rooster which led to the arrest of the suspects was not present at the trial, sufficient evidence, to the mind of Judge Crawford, was at hand Wednesday morning, for the conviction of Elmer Wimmer of chicken stealing. The two other defendants charged with complicity in the taking off of the fowl, were released.

It was developed that forty-two chickens from the roosts of two citizens, had been discovered strangely incarcerated in the roost at the Wimmer home, 414 Hickory street. The rooster, the faithful guardian of one section of the chickens, had led the officers to the new home of his charges.

Mrs. Wimmer admitted that the chickens were recent additions to her henery, and, as far as she knew, didn't belong there. She said Elmer Wimmer, a boarder, had brought the new chickens in. Wimmer paid his fine and was allowed to depart.

STRANGER FRIGHTENS THIEF WHO WOULD ROB THOMAS

Appears on Scene Just in Time to Put the Robbers to Hasty Flight.

Confronted by two highwaymen, one of whom thrust a gun in his face, W. M. Thomas, a Chicagoan, was saved from a robbery by the timely assistance of an unidentified stranger Tuesday night. Mr. Thomas was on his way home, passing the corner of Eighteenth and Chicago streets, when the two holdup men, who had been sitting on a railing, sprang from their perch and halted him with a gun and a command.

"I intended victim instead of submitting to the robbery quietly, shouted out a loud call for help. In an instant a fourth man came running on the scene in answer to the cry. The newcomers plunged into the fray and were seen to get in touch with and struck lustily at the highwaymen. The latter were panic-stricken at the interruption of their work and fled fear-stricken from the corner.

Mr. Thomas, in reporting the affair to the police Wednesday, remarked that he was anxious to get in touch with a rescuer again and thank him than to see the two holdup men under arrest.
