Dottie Dialogues

BY WALTER A. SINCLAIR. "Let us take steps to prevent gossip," said Dottie.

"Front steps, eh?" I inquired, seating myself beside her on one of the stone steps leading to the house door.

"Yes—the flight of fancy—your man's fancy," she answered.

"I don't fancy it much," I objected. "Isn't this a rather public place for you to sit beside the handsome stranger, with his cussed city way, who's liable?"

"Ah! but you are liable! Financially, that is, if there was a suit?"

"Spring suit? My tailor doesn't seem to think so," I admitted. "But isn't the season a bit too changeable to be giving this public view—speaking in an art term?"

"Maybe this is the family's regular night for having the use of the parlor—I mean living room. Dear me! How could I have been so stupid as to call it parlor? That sounds too much like pool at two-and-a-half cents a cue, or—um—ice cream," she concluded, pensively.

"Shuddering thought!" I exclaimed. "But I know why you want to sit out here—you're afraid somebody may steal your front lawn and carry it away in his pocket."

"I won't have our lawn slandered," she cried, indignantly.

"No, and you probably won't have your lawn lawndered," I punned. "Let's see. There's one blade of grass—no, I do believe there are two with two blades you could cut all the rest of the grass, if there should be a third blade."

"Sounds like you were talking about a jack knife," she murmured. "They don't look like very gay young blades," I agreed.

"Do you sprinkle the lawn with a fountain pen filler and move it with a safety razor?"

"My reason for sitting here ought to be plain," she resumed.

"Nothing about you could be plain," I answered.

"Ah! the south wind," she exclaimed. "Can't you see that some new neighbors are moving in over there? It's the local custom to oversee the job and appraise their furniture. They lived in a four-room apartment in a place that had uniform hall service, stationary ice boxes and movable beds."

"Marvelous! My dear Holmes, marvelous!" I cried. "How the deuce do you deduce it?"

"Perfectly simple, my dear Watson, meaning that the explanation is simple and not that you are," she diagrammed.

"I know that they lived in a four-room apartment because they have such a skimpy little mess of furniture. It'll be lost in that house—and all the neighbors

Open-Work Stockings Will Be Stylish This Year

There is nothing unusual about the stockings this season, but there is a decided preference for the old-fashioned white openwork hose in cotton, lisle thread and silk.

The polka dot in self and contrasting tones is popular. The newest in hose for wear with linen suits is a fine white cotton embroidered with cloaks in color.

THE HARD PART.

"I suppose writing poetry comes natural to him."

"Yes, more natural than playing."
