You?" "Oh, no!" returned the lady, freezing to sarcasm at the Boss' grouchy remark. "I never comb my hair for anything less than a ball. Come on, I'm ready." During the short drive to their destination a hostile silence prevailed in the cab, and the mind of the Boss' wife worked furiously on the picture of the Boss' dis-ish jealousy, when he should perceive the effect of her gown and other attractions on less calloused males. But, alas for his wife's calculations, the gathering in which they found themselves

Long haired male geniuses conversed in corners with short haired members of the intellectual female species. Funny, isn't it, how genius runs to hair in man and away from it in women! "Miss Blank, I want you to meet the famous Mr. Quill. Mr. Quill, of course you're familiar with Miss Blank's verse," the hostess was saying as the Boss and his spouse found their way toward her. Consternation wrote itself on the countenance of the Boss' wife as she heard these words. She read the papers religlously. She knew the literary magazines by heart, and yet she had never heard of the famous Mr. Quill; she had never thirty guests was proficient in some literread one of the charming verses of Miss ary or artistic stunt, and each performed you're familiar with those exquisite little cameos!" The Boss' wife tried not to look any blanker than she felt, and the Boss, as he was led away for execution by the venerable vision, found a ray of comfort in the realization that their hostess looked even blanker than his wife and that he had divined the reason why. For the Boss wife did not perform in any way, she had not a solitary parlor trick, much to his satisfaction. She was alone in her insignificance, however. Every other person among the Blank. She had, however, no time for at full length until the one bright spot of wonderment, for the next moment her own the evening was reached-what the Boss husband was bowing before a long, lank, termed, unpoetically, the "Eats."

While the Hoss gazed in something of panic at a strange and watery concection in a pale glass beside his plate, a long haired musician acress the table wound several feet of sprighetti about his fork and observed soulfully:-" 'Tis rose leaf punch, nectar of the gods! What pit; man cannot satisfy his material needs by inhaling the perfume of exquisite flowers; To think that we must sate our bodies with flesh! Faugh!" "How true," murmured the hostess, sympathetically, "Let me help you to some

"Have you heard Mr. Abramoski's new concerto?" gurgled the elderly vestal to the Boss. "Really, you must hear it. It has such a wonderful motif-so subtle!" 'The Boss looked rather disgustedly at the spaghetti weaver, who, he discovered, had several times removed his eyes from his plate long enough to cast several burning glances at his neighbor, the Boss' wife. "Ah!" murmured the musician, "it is nothing to the piece I shall compose this evening. I shall call it 'Love's Awakening,"" and again the Boss thought he detected an ardent glance.

"Oh, what a marvelous title!" gushed the vestal, and then, her attention focussed upon the Boss' wife for the first time, she remarked:-"What a knowing shade of lavender your gown is! I think the blue lavender is so subtle, don't you?" The Boss' wife blushed at being the center of so much attention and uttered some inaudible reply. "Don't you think so, Mr. Mann?" inquired the vestal. "Think what?" asked the Boss ungraclously. "Why, that blue lavender is much more subtle than pink lavender!" The Boss fixed a stony gaze on the lank locks of his wife's admirer. "Pardon my inattention," he said, "I was just wondering how long a man could live on the smell of hair oil," and then, speaking to the table at large, he added:-"Can anyhody here tell me which is the more subtle, bean or onion soup? They both have such delicious motifs?" (Copyright, 1910, by the N. Y. Herald Co.)
