> GOOD MIXERS IN PULPIT. Need of Close Sympathy Between

Pastors and People. St. Paul Pioneer Press. The trustees of Holyrood church in New York seek a new paster, advancing the charge that their present minister is not "pastoral" enough in his work. "What we need at Holyrood is a good mixer," declares one of the trustees. If the idea is new in its expression, it is worth serious consideration. Why should a preacher of the gospel be a recluse, shut off from the touch of his fellow man, cloistered among books and innocent of the problems of his time? The church is rapidly coming to feel that he should not be such.

Perhaps no complaint has been so general among those who criticisa the modern church as the charge that the preacher is not in close sympathy with the needs of his parish, that the church is not alive to the immediate problems that vex the human hearts of men struggling for existence in the midst of discouraging surroundings. It is true that more and more the church is coming to desire preachers who are "good mixers," who get out among men. meeting them in their toil and task, sensing their problems at first hand, and eager to help them in practical ways as well as i the purely religious ways. In a little city not far from here a young preacher organized a foot ball team and coached it himself. He was criticised for a time, but he got results far beyond the resuits of the gridiron battles. In another city not far from here preacher became mayor of a town and proceeded to inaugurate a system of street building which gave the city its first permanent roadways. No preacher has ever mixed actively with men without making his church a more relopment of aviation law, proposes to add vital institution and his work a more perof the minister. The men and women of his congregation have a duty and responsibility in the matter. If the minister takes full advantage of his opportunities to mingle with men and women, learn their thoughts and aspirations, and then fails, the responsibility is not his alone, but must be shared by those for whose benefit he works.
