PARIS, Sept. 3 .- (Special to The Bee.)-One of the interesting school fetes recently was the distribution of certificates of progress and capacity at the City of Paris Technical School for Girls. It is strictly a school for "trades and housekeeping," and is in the Rue Fondary. To enter it a girl must have gone through the whole primary course at a communal school. The age limits are from 13 to 15, and the pupil leaves at the end of the third year. The great houses of business show a keen interest in their work and generosity by sending materials for them to work upon. The competition among them to secure the servces of graduates is keen also. Some girls have entered on scholarships given by the city. Others pay fees, A great number, as deserving pupils at primary schools, are received because they are poor and good girls. The directress alone knows of the poverty of their families. All the girls take turns in the kitchen in preparing the midday meal, which is for the whole school. They also take turns in helping the "housekeepers" to tidy up. There are eight trades divisions namely, modes, artificial flowers and feather mounting, children's dresses, embroidery of tissues for wearing apparel and furniture, corsets, women's vests and jackets, lingerie, clear starching and fine ironing. All the housekeepers practice plain sewing, mending and

Divorce in France.

From 1888 to 1908 the number of divorces in the French working population has more than doubled, the marriages dissolved in the case of petitioners suing in forma pauperis having risen from 2,000 to 4,204, and having still further increased last year The Temps has asked various experts how they remark for this remarkable social fact. The secretary of the league for individual liberty believes that the increase of divorce comes partly from growing selfish ness on the part of husbands. On the other hand, women divorce either for immoral reasons or on the best moral grounds, in the latter case often because they can support themselves and their children without an idle husband to keep. Thus they prefer divorce to separation, the latter being farther on the decrease. At the same time, one cause of the increase of the divorce is merely the increase of marriages. In the French working population couples of travel from America to Ireland this living together without being married are ments which are not generally understood has passed entirely into the hands of the year is the visit of over 12,000 Americans rarer than formerly.
