Gas-Heated Iron

Even the gas range, which for economy and comfort surpasses any device for applying heat to sad irons from the outside, is not nearly so inexpensive as the Gas-Heated iron. All the heat is within the iron. None of it goes about the room. There is not a particle of expense excepting for heating the actual surface that is being used. That expense trifling as it is-begins when ironing is begun and ends when ironing ends-no "firing up" in preparation for ironing, and no remaking of fire at its close. You attach this iron to a gas-lighting bracket in any room of your home and remove it readily when desired. The one iron takes the place of several of the ordinar, kind, because it remains at the same temperature despite continued application to damp clothes. The steps this saves you should mean the cutting down of your ironing time
