UNCLE SAM'S CURIOUS JOBS

Many Unique Occupations in Running the Government.

SORTING WASTE BASKET SCRAPS
Watching Treasury Plates and Dies —The Signature Expert—Tea and Coffee Tasters, and Other Profitable Berths.

A few weeks ago Secretary MacVeagh was going over the pay roll of the Treasury department. He was looking for places to economize. His eye caught the names of two women listed as "waste basket examiners."

"What's that?" demanded the secretary. "They are the women who inspect the contents of the waste baskets," was the reply. "They are paid $60 a year each, and as we received last year $169 from the sale of the waste paper which passed through their hands there, would be no economy in dropping them."

Secretary MacVeagh was interested. He learned that the two women occupy a room in the basement of the great granite building and that they spend the entire day pulling over the scraps of paper, red tape and other articles that find their way into the departmental waste baskets. They are experts in this humble calling. The paper is sorted according to its quality, and all bits of twine and rubber bands are thrown to one side. It takes the two women the greater part of the day to scrutinize the output of the baskets for the day previous.

The chief purpose of this examination is to guard against the loss of money and valuable papers. It would be an easy thing for a bundle of bank notes or treasury notes to slip into a waste basket. The women have caught more than one valuable package of this kind. Also they have a keen eye open for official letters, reports and other documents which might have come to their baskets through the carelessness of clerks and messengers.

On the top floor of the same building is a chemist who tells all day long amid samples of oleomargarine, near butter and fake whiskies. The samples are sent to him by suspicious government agents who think the butter manufacturers and distillers are evading the law against adulteration. In addition to being a high-class chemist, this man is an expert witness. His skill in both lines recently won the government's suit against a certain packing company, in which the latter was fined $7,000 for selling oleomargarine colored to imitate butter.

Another man enjoys a sinecure in the bureau of engraving and printing. He is paid $2,000 a year simply to watch over the plates and dies from which the government's paper money and bonds are printed. The law makes the secretary of the treasury personally responsible for this valuable property. The secretary, in turn, intrusts it to a man in whom he has complete confidence, and who is responsible to the secretary and to no one else. At the close of each day the man gathers up the dies and the plates, puts them in the safe, and the next morning hands them out again.

Kiley, the Penman.
John Kiley has a unique job in the Treasury department. He writes his signature from morning till night. Secretary MacVeagh was appalled by the mass of treasury warrants, vouchers and other routine papers which the law required that he should sign. Other secretaries had been the slave of the same custom. Secretary Manning came nearest to freeing himself from the irksome requirement. His name, save for the final letter g, was written on all the routine documents by a clerk. Mr. Manning supplied the missing letter and the controller said it was all right. Secretary MacVeagh improved this scheme by inducing congress at the recent session to pass a law authorizing a clerk to do his signing. Now John Kiley attends to this job, affixing his name "for Franklin MacVeagh," which will sign on 20 to 150 documents a day. He has just finished a six-week task of putting his signature on 20,000 treasury warrants to members of the Cherokee Indian tribe, the money being in payment for a sale of lands belonging to the Indians.

Down at the Department of Agriculture three scientists are engaged in the interesting occupation of examining the contents of the stomachs of birds. They have done nothing else for the last two years. They are trying to find out whether certain birds are friends or enemies of farmers. Special agents in the field slay the birds by the hundreds and ship their stomachs to Washington in alcohol. These are microscopic-ally examined by three scientists, who tabulate everything they find.

The results have been surprising. By this method it has been discovered that hawks and owls are not the wicked birds of prey the farmers thought them to be. In the old days the farmer took keen satisfaction in shooting these supposed marauders. Now the intelligent agriculturist protects these birds. He realizes that although they may occasionally kill a chicken they perform valuable services in hunting the voracious rodents which destroy alike grain products, young trees and eggs of birds.

Women Experts Well Paid.
Three women have recently come to the front in the government service by reason of exceptional ability for the performance of unusual duties. These are Miss Anna H. Shortridge of the State department, Miss Margaret Kelley of the Treasury department and Mrs. Mabel J. Leroy of the Interior department.

Miss Shortridge is said to be the highest paid woman in the government service, her salary being $2,500 a year. She is a lawyer and an authority on international legal points. She was formerly employed in the Department of Justice, where her remarkable talents attracted the personal attention of Mr. Knox when he was attorney general. He frequently detailed her to prepare government briefs in important cases.

When Mr. Knox entered the State department the first thing he did was to ask for the transfer of Miss Shortridge from the Department of Justice. Later Secretary Knox informed the senate committee on foreign affairs that Miss Shortridge was a splendid lawyer and he would not hesitate to intrust to her the preparation of the most important brief involving our foreign relations.

Miss Margaret Kelley was recently appointed "adjuster of accounts" for the United States mints at a salary of $2,000. This is a position that heretofore has always been held by a man. Miss Kelley is declared the highest paid woman in the Treasury department. She has been virtually acting as director of the mints ever since A. Platt Andrew was transferred from this post to that of assistant secretary of the treasury.

Mrs. Leroy has nothing to do except sign the name of William H. Taft. This she affixes to United States land patents, for which service she receives $1,200 a year. The position is given to the widow of officers who have served in the army and navy.

Destroying Money.
A man with a deft hand and an accurate eye pushes stacks of paper money under a mutilating knife from 5 a. m. until 4:30 p. m. every day in the treasury. The money is worn and soiled and comes to the treasury for redemption. Afterward it is mutilated by a punching machine and a steel blade. The man on the job destroys in this way an average of $1,500,000 worth of currency a day. His pay for getting rid of a trifle like $400,000,000 a year is $1,300.

R. C. McCoy is the government actuary. He is a wonderful juggler of figures. He finds out what will be the annual revenue as the result of an increase of 5 per cent ad valorem in the duty on mercerized cotton. The actuary works out the financial schemes of those who would remodel the currency, and tells whether or not the retirement of the greenbacks and the issuance of emergency currency will flood the treasury vaults or bring on a bond issue. He answers any kind of puzzle in which figures are involved.

In the Washington navy yard Naval Constructor David W. Taylor has a huge model tank in which he plays with toy battleships, cruisers and submarines. It looks like play, but it isn't. He is making scientific demonstrations of the effect on a vessel's speed, coal consumption and other features resulting from ever so slight a change in the outward formation of the hull.

In the treasury service are expert tea and coffee tasters, who tell the value and grades of these commodities by placing a few grains on the tongue. In the department of Agriculture a force of young men eat drugged foods to determine just how poisonous they are. All of which goes to show that the business of running a big government gives rise to many curious occupations.—Washington Star.
