Council Says No Funds for the Inspectors

Chairman of the Finance Committee Says There is No Chance.

There is only one chance that the money asked for by Health Commissioner Connell without which he declares he cannot keep his force for the rest of the year can be raised. The council is allowed to draw from any extra funds that it may have on hand for any purpose and apply the money to a special fund that is in need. This can be done with an emergency ordinance, but the members of the council seem not at all anxious to do it and the feeling is general that the once dairy inspectors, including Dr. Young, the once dairy inspector, will have to go.

Councilman Sheldon, chairman of the finance committee, says: "There is no money available and we have no way to give Dr. Connell any extra funds. Nothing will be done by the council."

President Brucker says: "We cannot draw upon an emergency fund in a case of this sort because there is no urgent necessity for these inspectors. The council will simply keep its hands off and let the health commissioner run his own department."

The matter will come up before the council Monday afternoon in the meeting of the committee of the whole and the question of interference will be settled then.

Mrs. Louise M. Root Succumbs

Wife of Sovereign Commander of the Woodmen of the World Dies After Long Illness.

Mrs. Louise M. Root, wife of Mr. J. C. Root, the sovereign commander of the Woodman of the World, died Friday morning at 2 o'clock at her home at 1044 South Thirtieth street. For the last ten years Mrs. Root has been more or less of an invalid with rheumatism.

Mr. and Mrs. Root have been residents of Omaha ever since they came here from Lyons, Ia., in 1880. Mrs. Root was 60 years old, and was born at Davenport, Ia. She is survived by her husband and two sons, Harry J. and Alanson J., both of Omaha.

The funeral will be held from the residence at 2 o'clock Monday afternoon. Interment will be in Forest Lawn cemetery.

The following will act as pall bearers: John T. Yates, B. W. Jewell, Dr. I. W. Porter, Dr. A. D. Cloyd, J. F. Hamilton, G. W. Packard and Samuel Shyoga.

Mexico in the Centennial Year of Its Independence

(Editorial Correspondence.)

MEXICO CITY, Sept. 15.

The necessary historical background for an adequate perspective of the Mexican centennial which the country is celebrating is furnished by Queretaro, which is famous not only as the cradle of Mexican independence, but also as the stage for the last scene in the life drama of the ill-fated Maximilian, from which the second and greater republic dates. We were to have arrived at Queretaro about 1:30 o'clock in the afternoon, but the train could not make up the lost time and it was near 9 o'clock in the evening when we pulled into the station. There we discovered that the governor of the state, General Cosío, and his retinue had been waiting for us all those hours with the official greeting and program that was to be carried out with due ceremonialness.

To the Plaza we went in special street cars, where the finishing touches were being put to a fine monument of Josefa Ortiz, in order to have it in readiness for the unveiling and dedication in the morning. The workman, under supervision of the engineer in charge, were ignoring the eight-hour law, if any such exists, and drilling the holes in the granite for the bolts to attach the bronze figures—all by electric light. It should be explained, now perhaps as well as later, that the centennial celebration is being commemorated all over Mexico by the erection of just such monuments to the heroes of the nation and the founding of public institutions and prosecution of permanent public improvements at an aggregate outlay of $100,000,000.

After listening to a band concert, we repaired to the governor's palace for a luncheon and inspection of the audience chamber and historical room. Here are a number of historic relics of more than ordinary interest. In a glass case may be seen the lock and keyhole, through which Josefa Ortiz whispered the warning that the conspiracy for freedom hatched under the name of the Society for the Study of Fine Arts had been discovered by the Spaniards, on which warning the curate, Hidalgo, took it on himself to force the issue by the Grito de Dolores, or the ringing of the bell to summon all patriots to fight for independence. Here, too, may be seen the original coffin of Maximilian, a plain wooden box with finger imprints of the Austrian prince, plainly preserved in sharply marked blood stains. In the morning we drove out to the chapel which has been erected on the spot where the unfortunate Maximilian and his two companions were executed, three shafts of stone ranged in front of the shrine exactly where each stood as the soldiers fired, that on the right where Maximilian fell being accentuated by a wreath of flowers, lavishly entwined with silk ribbons of both Austrian and Mexican colors.

Queretaro is the outlet of Mexico's opal mines, and the stranger is soon made aware of this fact by the street vendors who produce these brilliant gems apparently by necromancy from all sorts of hidden pockets in their tattered clothes. The opal sellers are a class by themselves, yet have the common Mexican trait of fixing a price which they do not expect to get and asking for a counter-offer, with a view to a compromise by splitting the difference. I think nearly every one in our party took a chance in the opal lottery. I said "nearly every one" advisedly, because one had nerve enough to withstand the temptation. "Not for me," he declared. "They're unlucky. We started out of St. Louis on track 2; we upset three men on the handicap the first day out; we left one man behind at San Antonio; no opals for me."

Another little experience at Queretaro is possibly worth recording as illustrative of Mexican life. Returning from the palace at midnight, we noticed that the stone pavement in the station was thick with sleeping or dozing Mexicans, men, women and children, and gave vent to vigorous expression of our feelings of sympathy for the poor folks who had no other place to go. How long a time had elapsed I cannot say, but the next thing I recall was awakening from a sound slumber in the berth by an unearthly babble of voices shrieking in different keys and wailing cadenzas as if some tremendous tumult was on. My first thought was that the natives had resented the American intrusion and had instituted a riot as a hostile demonstration. A second plausible explanation that suggested itself was that Murdock had gone out among the Mexicans to organize an insurgent party and was putting them through the first lessons under the gag rules of the lower house of our American congress. Cautious exploration through the open car window, however, soon brought a better idea of what was going on. A train had pulled into the station loaded with passengers, and the host of Mexican onhangers whom we had seen sleeping on the floor were besetting the new comers trying to sell them fruits, candies, cakes and other wares. Each of the assaulting column had a wooden tray about two feet square, in the center of which stood a little oil lantern, with the wares spread around and was jumping up and down and yelling at the top of his voice like a demon. I later learned that the cries were announcements of the prices at which a midnight quick lunch was to be had. This outbreak on the station platform was repeated three times during the night as trains passed through, but in the morning not a sign of the food-selling mob was visible.

We did not stay for the ceremonies over the monument. The drive to the Maximilian chapel and inspection of churches consumed the morning, and we were late, as it was, to make our train schedule to Mexico City, where we were due at 2:30 in the afternoon. But we did not realize that we had an American engineer on the locomotive bearing the euphonious name of Rafferty and that he was recognizing no speed limit. We not only made up for a tardy start, but also "showed" the Mexicans something by reaching our destination here in Mexico City fifteen minutes ahead of the time table.
