Before the new congress assembled the war panic had passed away and the democrats were inviting the attention of the people to the odious sedition law which was used by the federalists in office for the purpose of imprisoning every editor or pamphleteer who criticised President Adams or any official of his administration. The grand jury of Hamilton district,

Tennesses, then far on the frontier, took the first formal action in protest against the alien and sedition laws. It was a mooted question whether or not even an official body could criticise congress for passing these laws without laying its members liable to imprisonment. In the Virginia legislature a delegate, J. Taylor of Caroline county, offered a resolution asserting the right of members of the legislature to immunity from the penalties of the sedition law if any member should in conscience be constrained to charge congress with an infraction of the constition in the passage of the law. In these modern times when someone assails almost every act of congress as being unconstitutional, the language of Mr. Taylor's reso lution seems to be very mild indeed. But it was not then so regarded. The New York Daily Advertiser, a federalist publication in commenting on this resolution said: "How can we restrain our indignation at such proceedings? On the other hand, Adams and most of the federalists were equally sincers in believing that Jefferson and the democrats desired only to overthrow all government and to substitute anarchic chaos for constitutional order. Neither party gave the other thee slightest credit for honesty of purpose or sincerity of conviction.

In 1800, for the first time, candidates were chosen by the parties. Adams was nominated for president by a secret canous of the federalist members of congress, with Charles C. Pinckney for vice president. The democratic members of congress, also in a secret caucus, nominated Jefferson for president and Aaron Burr for vice president. In those times, under the original provisions of the constitution, each elector cast his vote for two candidates for presidenct, the one receiving the greatest number, being a clear majority, to be president, and the one receiving the next sighest number to be vice president. Conrary to the practice which ever since then has obtained, more attention was paid to the congressional campaign than to the presidential election, and while all the democrats unquestionably were for Jefferson for president, all of the seventythree democratic electors voted both for Jefferson and Burr and thereby caused a tie. Of course, the election then went into

The American branch was founded sufficient to keep in solution all the waste in colonial times by Captain De Koven of matters, that they may be carried off by the British army. Reginald Do Koven's father was the Rev. Henry De Koven, a scholarly man who sought to make music only a subsidiary part of his son's educa-

Only a small part of De Koven's youth was spent in his native state. Father and son went abroad and the boy studied music at some of the best German schools and was prepared for Oxford university by his father. He took his degree in 1879 and returned to Germany for further muscal study. His first reputation was made as a composer of songs. His communic light opera, "Robin Hood." first brought him into general attention, and this great success was followed by "Rob Roy," "The Fencing Master" and other tuneful oper-
