FRUITS OF CARELESS MOTORING

How the Speed Mania Helps to Fatten Cemetery—Different Ways of Reaching the Finish.

Plagues recently gathered by the federal census show that the automobile, from one point of view, is a very expensive invention. It is a great source of pleasure to multitudes of people, and an important aid to civilization, but the toll it takes of human life is nothing short of frightful. As the motor car has grown more popular, it has naturally become more destructive. In the year 1908 automobiles killed 166 persons in this country. In 1907 they took 168 lives. In 1906 they wiped out 136 people. These are the figures of the census, which estimates that, at a rough guess, 1,000 persons will be killed by motor cars in the United States during the twelve months of 1910. It would be close to the truth to say that the automobile, in this country, costs three lives a day. The tax is undeniably a heavy one. In rural districts the chief sufferers are the automobilists themselves—the most common kind of accident they encounter being collisions with railroad and trolley trains. One might suppose that drivers of motor cars would be so on their guard against dangers of this particular sort that such happenings would be rare, but the fact is that they are of constant occurrence—as one may perceive by an attentive perusal of the newspapers from day to day.

Temping the Grim Reaper.
Nothing is more common than to hear of instances in which automobiles have deliberately raced with locomotives, the object in view being to get over the crossing before the arrival of the train at that point. It is literally a race with death, and must be extremely exciting; but most people would rather get their excitement in some less hazardous way. On the other hand, most fatal automobile accidents in cities find their victims in foot-passengers, who are run over on the streets. During six weeks in October and November of last year, seventeen children were killed in this manner in Greater New York. Indeed, mortality from this cause in large centers of population is largely among boys and girls, a great majority of whom have no playgrounds other than the streets, and are obliged to take their chances with the motor cars, dodging them as they come along. Sixty-eight persons were killed by automobiles in Greater New York in the year 1909, just about half of this number meeting their tragic fate on Manhattan island. In many of these cases where people were run over, the drivers of the cars were probably not to blame. It is difficult to run a gasoline-propelled vehicle through a city crowded with traffic on foot and on wheels. But who, a generation ago, could have imagined that the time would ever arrive when locomotives would be allowed to run on the streets—and not on rails, at that?

A custom long established among the prudent demands that before attempting to cross a railroad, one shall pause and look both ways, to make sure that no train is coming. If a train is seen approaching, even though it is a considerable distance away, one waits until it has passed. But in these days any important city street is more dangerous to cross than a railroad—especially in view of the circumstance that automobiles are not restricted to tracks. A motor car may even whisk unexpectedly around a corner at any moment, catching the wayfarer unawares. But people ordinarily do not wait; they simply take their chances, and dodge. They do not always escape, however, as the mortality records show. But it is interesting to learn that, taking the whole country over, two out of every three automobile victims are occupants of the cars which suffer the accidents. Some are killed in collisions with locomotives, in the manner already described; others are upset while going at high speed (the vehicles often "turning turtle"); still others are run over by automobiles, and yet others are blown up by explosions of gasolene. There are a good many ways of dying in a motor mishap. It goes without saying that a great majority of the fatal accidents to people riding in automobiles are attributable to fast driving. Most persons who drive such vehicles have little or no knowledge of mechanics, and lack the special training which would enable them to do the right thing quickly and instinctively in a perilous emergency. The average man is startled by the ability to command superhuman speed by the touch of a finger. He uses this marvelous power recklessly, not realizing the danger, and it is not surprising that in frequent instances he should bring destruction upon himself and others.

Great Power in Ignorant Hands.
This is what is called the "speed mania." Put a great force in the hands of an ignorant person—a description applicable to very many motorists—and he will surely misuse it. If he himself were the only sufferer, one might be resigned; but he kills other people. Oh, yes, it happens every day. And is this dangerous individual punished? Not at all. He pays a small fine, perhaps, and goes on his way rejoicing. The law rarely makes any attempt to inflict a penalty for misdeeds of the kind. In fact, jail sentences for such offenses are almost unknown. The court records everywhere show an amazing lack not only of convictions in cases of the sort, but even of indictments for automobile killings. They can hardly be said to be rated as anything so important as misdemeanors. No wonder, then, that they continue. Man-slaughter by automobile is today the safest of all forms of crime—the term being not in the slightest degree inappropriate where, as so often happens, a deliberate indifference to putting others in peril is accountable for the fatality. Any observant individual is in a position to notice that the average driver of an automobile is not accustomed to pause in order to avoid running over a foot passenger on the street. As a matter of fact, at crossings the foot passenger has the right of way, but to this the motorist pays no regard. He "honks" his horn, and, if the unfortunate pedestrian does not get out of the way, so much the worse for him. Only the other day an old man in the city of Washington was run down and killed in exactly this manner. He could not move fast enough, and so he died. Such things are constantly happening.

Assumes Too Much.
Why should the motorist consider that he always and under all circumstances has the right way? It is because he possesses the force majeure, and nobody is in a position to dispute with him. By no means let it be said that a majority of automobile drivers are indifferent to the rights of others; but certain it is that a large percentage of them are so, the trait being most strikingly exhibited by the individual who, as the representative of a type only too common, has come to be known as the "road hog." He cares for nobody. If he makes an "accidental" killing, his conscience does not trouble him in the least. What business had the "hog" to be in the way? If practicable, he runs for it, leaving the victim to take his chances, and usually escapes. Only a few weeks ago in the outskirts of Manhattan a couple of men in a fouring car, accompanied by three or four women, after dark in the evening, going at great speed, ran through a group of four men, knocking them down and killing two. When a policeman, standing near by, tried to halt them, they kept right on the women yelling back with jeers of derision. Of course, they got away, and were never caught or punished.

Drunk? Doubtless, yes. But this is one of the principal causes of automobile killings. People go out in automobiles for pleasure; they stand quite as a matter of course, for drinks. The alcoholic refreshment they imbibe makes them reckless, and, on their way home, the feeling on board is that it matters not whether school keeps or not. But it matters quite a good deal to the luckless victims whom they run over. This sort of thing is unquestionably accountable for a considerable percentage of the deaths from motor accidents.

ing there" is bother with ethical obstacles. Well, he pays the price himself, to a large extent. For every person struck and killed by the motor car, two automobiles are destroyed in a great variety of ways—most of them through imprudence or carelessness. One of these, not uncommonly, is the practice of "rushing" road crossings which are more or less concealed from view. This saves one's skin as well as time which might be lost by slowing up to see if a wagon, a carriage or another car is coming. In a majority of cases the other vehicle is not there, and so much gained. But every now and then it happens that the wagon or car arrives at just the wrong moment and a collision results with a loss of one or more lives. Another frequent cause of fatal accidents is turning at high speed. Of course it is a mere to do so at a twist in the road, but it is not done so in ordinary prudence. If this be not done the wheels are liable to slip—the process technically known as "skidding"—and all control over the direction of the vehicle's course is lost until the wheels grip the road again. Incidentally, it is more or less likely to upset. Yet another way of getting into trouble is to coast down hill at full speed. If one wheel strikes a soft spot the car is likely to upset. There may be a patch of rain-washed sand near the bottom of the declivity, quite capable of causing the automobile to turn a somersault. Lots of folks are killed in such ways—Brooklyn Eagle.
