Old Freight House of Burlington is Destroyed by Fire

Blaze Guts Landmark and Destroys Records of Years Friday Afternoon.

Fire which started from an unknown cause at 2:45 yesterday afternoon almost totally destroyed the old Burlington freight house at Eighth and Howard streets.

The records of the freight office covering a period of more than eight years were a total loss. But the records of the last year were saved from the fire, but the water effaced the indelible ink writing upon them, making them practically worthless.

The burned building was not worth much and was soon to have been torn down.

General Freight Agent C. E. Spens does not think the destruction of the old records will be a source of much trouble. No freight suffered.

The first small flame was discovered in the record room by Martin Brown, assistant chief clerk. He turned in an alarm immediately, but the flames quickly spread among the papers and ignited the wooden walls of the room.

Eighty clerks escaped with their effects, including typewriters and adding machines, without mishap.

"How the fire started is a mystery," said J. L. Herrington, the local freight agent of the Burlington, who has charge of the freight depot. "All we know is that it began in the record room. I cannot estimate the loss to the building nor place the intrinsic value of the old records which were destroyed. There will be at least seventy employes thrown temporarily out of work. The work on the new freight depot will be rushed to completion."
