English Criticism. Both criticism and praise of American railways were embodied in a statement made by W. M. Acworth the English rail-Mauretania. Mr. Acworth has been making a study of American railroads during the last two months, incidentally testifying be-fore the president's railroad securities commission. He has made several previous examinations of American railroads at in-tervals of two or three years. The principal defect that Mr. Acworth mentiles as of American railway manage-ment lies in "the centralisation of adminis-trative power in headquarter's offices in Chicage and New York, which, while tend-ing, doubtless, to efficiency and economy, is
