The attempt to assassinate Premier Stolypin is the culmination of intense hostility directed against him for the establishment last March of the Zemstvo, or local governments, in certain provinces, and it is another chapter also in Russia's troublous

Until March last the law-making authority was regarded as resting entirely with the newly organized Duma. At that time, however, the upper chamber of the Duma rejected Premier Stolypin's bill establishing the Zemstvo in the six provinces of Minsk, Mohileff, Vitebsk, Kieff, Volhynia and Podolina. Despite the rejection Premier Stolypin declared the bill a law and banished those members of the upper chamber who had opposed it. The premier defended his course in decreeing the law despite the Duma by a clause of the Russian constitution providing for executive under "extraordinary circumaction
