The Half-Talents

BY DR. MAX NORDAU. WHEN the good fairies want to be kind to some child of man, they place on its cradle as a gift some handsome talent. It is the most precious gift they are able to bestow upon their favorite. It is a sure talisman to happiness in life and wealth. It is worth far more than high birth or rank. It transforms the commonplace impressions of reality into feelings of pleasure. It enlarges and broadens the conscience of the ego and strengthens the confidence in the active forces of your personality. You may convince yourself of this subjective value of talent by the joy and pleasure with which the great and powerful of this world cultivate such talent given them. In spite of the enormous work of a conscientious ruler of 300,000,000 of men, Queen Victoria of England found time to paint beautiful water colors. Her husband, King Carlos of Portugal, whose life was not short in such a tragical manner, was a painter with life and and rhythm have continually haunted her fair head. If from the level of the throne we step down one step into high society, the number of amateur artists of all kinds that we find is almost boundless. Count Beust, who in his "Memories" boasts of having invented the Austrian-Hungarian compromise, wrote excellent madrigals in French and composed dances that are not without considerable charm. The dowager duchess of Uzès models wonderful statues, and a monument of Joan of Arc from her chisel ornaments the principal square in a large French provincial town. In Paris society ladies have for years had an annual "salon." In the catalogue of which you find all the names of the Altmannch de Gotha, and in the rooms of which you are impressed much in the same manner as at the "salon" of the real professional artists. Dukes, marquises and counts gather delighted in front of the works of their wives. All the liberal careers also have their "salon." Judges and lawyers, doctors, actors and journalists exhibit with paternal joy and tenderness the fruits of their love of art, and the number of their paintings, designs, etchings and sculptures show with how much zeal all these busy intellectual people sacrifice at the altar of the Muses. Evidently all these small talent coupled with ambition aims at a target beyond the range of his wealth and is irrevocably doomed to see his choice fall short. The half talent of the ambitious is no longer the ornamental plant he cultivated for his own pleasure. He cultivates it for what he expects it to produce. His effort is no longer to find employment for himself, but to accomplish something, to reach a success common to others, to pursue glory, fame, wealth, admiration and all the tributes which the public pays voluntarily to the chosen one. This harvest is naturally denied him. Why should not the public reward him, too? It renders its homage to the exceptionally gifted individual who stands out prominently, visible from afar, above the common plane. But such a person is neither the half talent nor the talent. Let me be allowed to repeat here the definition of talent which I have given in my "Psycho-physiology of Genius and Talent." "A talented individual is a being who performs actions that are generally or frequently practiced in a better way than the majority of those who have tried to devote themselves to the same routine." From this follows that it does not lie in the character of the talent to surprise or dazzle by the novelty of its efforts. It does not demand new ideas or a gen-no more guarantees a safe way of making a living than it gratifies the vanity, and this is the cause, aside from the material distress of the proletariat of talents of the stirring inner tragedies of crushed and tortured pride. If you wish the wellbeing of anyone, you should rather wish him to be absolutely devoid of talent than the possession of a small talent coupled with ambition, an ambition which is always strong enough to suit even the most prodigious genius. Cautious Philanthropist. In a New York street a wagon loaded with lamps collided with a truck and many of the globes were smashed. Considerable sympathy was felt for the driver as he gazed ruefully at the shattered fragments. A benevolent-looking old gentleman eyed him compassionately. "My poor man," he said, "if I suppose you will have to make good this loss out of your own pocket?" "Yes," was the melancholy reply. "Well, well," said the philanthropist, "here's a quarter for you, and I dare say some of those other people will give you a helping hand, too." The driver held out his hat and several coins landed with a deep clink into it. At last, when the contribution had ceased, he emptied the contents of his hat into his pocket, then, glancing at the retreating figure of the philanthropist who had started the collection, he heaved a sigh and said to the wise guy: "That's me boss."
