Desperate Desmond

Thrilling Scenes in a Telephone Office. Turkish Plot Foiled! Desperate Battle in the Trenches! All Drawn from Telegraphic Descriptions.

By Hershfield

Copyright, 1911, National News Association.

It is an inspiring spectacle, that of the gallant Claude, the famous Shavus and the fair Rosamond, with the villainous Desmond in their power. Outside are the Turkish forces, but what can they do against Claude and Shavus? The latter, who has advised many a general in difficult campaigns, now advises Claude to tie Desmond to the switchboard.

The purpose of this advice is now seen. The first call sent into the office will send a terrific electric shock through the body of the villain, and the executioner will probably be one of his own friends, if one so base can be said to have friends. Mr. Shavus, the great correspondent, is, so to speak, there with the noodle in this case, and his advice was a real boon to Claude.

Outside a crafty Turk has a plan to call up the telephone office and send in a fake message of surrender in the hope of deceiving the gallant defenders. Little does the Turk guess that his deception will merely put an end to the life of the man whom they all admire as the greatest crook of the age. Yet such is the irony of fate. Kismet, as the Turks say.

Not yet, however, is the villain's odious life to be ended. As the Turkish soldier enters the drug store and heads for the booth an attendant notices the cigarette in his lips. As smoking in a small booth is not a pleasant thing for other patrons, the drug clerk seizes the soldier and throws him out into the street. What does a drug clerk care for a Bashibazouk anyway?

Naturally the soldier doesn't like this, and when his fellows hear the story they don't like it either. So a plot is formed to wreck the drug store, and away go the soldiers, leaving the hero, the writer, the villain and the proud beauty in the telephone office. What a lonely place a telephone office must be when the wires are all out of commission. The silence must be deafening.

Game to the last, Claude is heading a brave defense against the Turkish troops. Armed only with telephone receivers the little band, nevertheless, keeps at bay the Sultan's finest soldiers. Not that the impact of a 'phone receiver on the ear would be relished by the bravest of the Rough Riders even. Tomorrow we will have particulars.
